

T/ EK

unpublished

ORIGINEN PATRIE

DEDICATED

BY THE AUTHOR

TO

THE PATRIOTIC SOCIETY

R. T. HAMMOND

OF THE PATRIOTIC SOCIETY

PRINTED BY THE PATRIOTIC SOCIETY, 1881

LONDON: HENRY KIM, CAUTION

ORIGINES PATRICIÆ;

OR

A DEDUCTION

OF

EUROPEAN TITLES OF NOBILITY AND DIGNIFIED OFFICES,

FROM

THEIR PRIMITIVE SOURCES.

BY

R. T. HAMPSON,

AUTHOR OF "MEDIÆ ÆVI KALENDARIVM," &c. &c.

"NONE CAN BE SAID TO KNOW THINGS WELL, WHO DO NOT KNOW THEM IN THEIR BEGINNINGS."—SIR W. TEMPLE.

LONDON: HENRY KENT CAUSTON.

MDCCCXLVI.

TO
LOUIS PHILIPPE, KING OF THE FRENCH, IN WHOSE PERSON
HAS BEEN HAPPILY REVIVED
THE ENNOBLING TITLE OF THOSE ANCIENT MONARCHS, WHOSE POWER AND MAGNIFICENCE WERE ESTIMATED, NOT BY THE EXTENT OF THEIR TERRITORIAL RULE, BUT BY THE MULTITUDE OF HEARTS ACKNOWLEDGING THEIR SUPREMACY, IT IS NOT IMPROPER
TO DEDICATE A WORK FOUNDED UPON THIS PRINCIPLE OF TRUE AND NATURAL NOBILITY.
WERE IT OTHERWISE,
THE CONSIDERATIONS THAT THE PRESENT KING OF THE FRENCH, NOTWITHSTANDING HIS ILLUSTRIOUS ANCESTRY, ABLY DISCHARGED
THE DUTIES OF A PRIVATE CITIZEN, AND SHEWED HIMSELF SUPERIOR TO ADVERSE CIRCUMSTANCES; AND THAT AS A MONARCH,
HE WISELY APPLIES HIS CULTIVATED MIND
TO THE WELFARE OF HIS PEOPLE, WHILE HE PRESERVES
THE ESTEEM AND FRIENDSHIP OF SURROUNDING NATIONS;—
WOULD FULLY JUSTIFY THIS MODE OF TESTIFYING THE ADMIRATION OF SUCH AS HAVE LEARNED TO VALUE MEN
FOR THE QUALITIES WITH WHICH THEY ARE ADORNED, AND NOT BY SUBSTITUTES FOR PERSONAL MERIT.

PREFACE.

THERE are not many subjects that have been more sedulously investigated than the titles which time out of mind have been appropriated to the more considerable land-owners. As history leaves us in the dark both as to the origin and the primitive meaning of most of the terms so applied, both scholars and heralds have very properly resorted to the assistance of etymology; but totally overlooking the condition in which our ancestors were placed at no very remote period, when the same titles were still in use, and when consideration in society was only to be obtained by bodily vigour and prowess, or by the exercise of some quality advantageous to the state, or the occupying of some public office, they proceeded upon an erroneous principle. They have sought for the meaning of titles, even of those which have obvious reference to the performance of some duty, in words of similar orthography, and significant of our modern notions of rank, dignity, magnificence, or veneration. No thoughts of this kind either did or could enter the heads of the rude and barbarous inventors of titles. Other errors, less considerable, and dependent upon the mode of investigation pursued, directed my attention to the subject ; and after much labour, and wearisome, because unguided, research, the following pages resulted.

I am not perfectly correct in saying that I was unguided. I had before my eyes the success which attended the investigations of the great continental philologists, one of whom, Professor POTT, by tracing European words through various forms up to the Sanskrit cognate or its root, has thrown new and valuable light upon the signification of many vocables that were hitherto doubtful or obscure. I have combined their processes, and in most cases detected the primary signification, generally under a Sanskrit veil.

With a view to enable others to follow each inquiry, an introductory chapter is given ; and though inserted in other works, Dr. GRIMM's neat and comprehensive canon of the mutation of consonants in their transition from one language to another, is copied, for the convenience of the general reader.

In full persuasion, that no ancient people employed words of the nature of titles in the loose manner that is observable in our times, and that they did not institute honorary or empty dignities, I conceived that by ascertaining the original meaning of the designation of an office, we should be better enabled to form a judgment of its original duties.

On this principle, I have proceeded to examine the titles of honor used throughout feudal Europe, without regard to country or language; classing them, not so much according to the rank, to which many of them are yet applied, as according to the duties that they appear to have originally denoted. It is not for me to say whether I have succeeded or not. The result has been to show, that some, to which a high dignity is now annexed, were comparatively inferior in ancient times, and that others, which are now sunk into contempt or disuse, were formerly of great account.

The mode of investigating the etymologies of the names or titles here adopted, being very different from that which has hitherto been followed, has necessarily conducted to very different consequences.

It was impossible to treat of the meaning of the words employed by feudalists, without bestowing some consideration upon the extent of the influence acquired by their system. This step was rendered the more necessary, that one elegant and learned writer of our days has excluded Scandinavian nations from that influence; and another author of high reputation has taught that feodality originated in Roman laws and institutions, for so I understand his language. Others had already attributed the rise of the feudal system to the barbarians, who overran the lower empire, and several had also spoken of it as universal, and of considerable higher antiquity than the decline of Rome. I have, therefore, applied myself to collect a few of the more convincing proofs of its existence among the Northern tribes, from the remains of Scandinavian literature. I know not how such proofs can be rejected, without admitting that an entire people would establish offices, whose duties are feudal, that feudal usages might be practised among them, and that they would employ the most remarkable of the feudal formularies and terms, without being influenced by the system itself. The same observation applies to the Anglo-Saxons, who are scarcely allowed to have known anything connected with feodality, before the arrival of the Normans. It will be seen that all are not pretended to have possessed this principle of government in the same degree at any given era; although it might be contended, that in its simple state, before the complete settlement of the barbarians in the Roman provinces, there was little or no difference among them; although certainly afterwards, the feudal law received considerable additions, of which some nations would adopt more, and others fewer.

This portion of the work might easily have been continued to a much greater length; but my object did not require a more minute examination or closer comparison, than was absolutely necessary to account for the use of the same titles and appellations among the different nations of Teutonic or Germanic and Scandinavian Europe.

In the Appendix, I have republished the remarkable poem called Rigs Mal, on the origin of the Orders of Society, with almost a literal translation in English. I refer to it here for the purpose of stating, that, as I have not always agreed with the Swedish translator in the sense of some words and passages, his Latin version may be seen in Dr. Jamieson's Illustrations of Northern Antiquities, by such as find occasion for dissatisfaction. The Glossarial Index will be found useful in showing the connexion of similarly spelled titles in different languages, and their common affinity to a radical form. The latter is briefly stated, but the reasoning or deduction will be found in the pages indicated.

If the investigation has not resulted in tracing titles of nobility to words expressive of honor, or reverence, or admiration, as the derivations of others generally import, it shows that ideas of public guardianship, protection, and utility of several kinds, were generally the foundation of the offices whence the appellations of dignity emanated. If any of them do not accord with modern notions of the splendour of rank, it should be remembered that their inventors were a rude people, without wealth, and without magnificence, dependent for their subsistence upon pillage, pasturage, and the precarious success of the chase.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

	Page
ASIATIC ORIGIN OF EUROPEAN TITLES	9

- 1.—Historical research extended and facilitated by modern philology.
- 2.—The primary import of titular honors ascertainable by etymology.
- 3.—Prevailing errors of heraldic and legal authors and lexicographical etymologists in regard to titles.
- 4.—Selden misled by false philology.
- 5.—His Titles of Honor defective before the 5th century.
- 6.—Ill consequences of supposing primitive nations to have borrowed their ordinary words from each other.
- 7.—Classical and Teutonic languages coeval; first population of Europe.
- 8.—Importance of etymology as a science; Dr. Grimm's Canon of Consonantal Transition.
- 9.—Antiquity of Sanskrit.
- 10.—Closer affinity of Anglo-Saxon than Old German and Gothic with Sanskrit.
- 11.—Asiatic traditions apparently relating to early tribes settled in Europe.
- 12.—The Sakas and Sakasenas, now called Saxons.

CHAPTER II.

THAT THE CHIEFS OF THE SAKASENAS AND THE FIRST ROMANS WERE DISTINGUISHED BY TITLES SIGNIFI- CANT OF THE CARE DUE FROM THEM TO THEIR FOLLOWERS	25
--	----

- 1.—Aldor, and Elder, originally the appellation of a chief, without reference to age or other bodily accident.
- 2.—Invariably used in the sense of a prince.
- 3.—Is the etymological cognate of the Latin altor.
- 4.—Aldii and other terms derived from the same root.
- 5.—Aldor-men, kings or chiefs.
- 6.—Attaman, what.
- 7.—Altheirrin, chiefs of the Germans.
- 8.—False derivations of Alderman; old age not esteemed by rude nations.
- 9.—Ealdor, Alder, and Elder were not used as adjectives, but in their own substantive character.
- 10.—Terms and names of places allusive to the residence or occupancy of the aldor; alodh, or ale, liquid nutriment; alod and alodium, land so called from serving for alimony; franc-aloud, free-alimony.
- 11.—Feodal lords among the Rajpoots of Mewar.

CHAPTER III.

	Page
CHIEFS, WITH TITLES ALLUSIVE TO FOOD, AND LAND ANTIENTLY GRANTED FOR SUSTENANCE	37

- 1.—Patriarchal nature of the original feudal system. 2.—The patres of the Romans were aldors or chiefs of tribes. 3.—Senators, not old men: derivation of father. 4.—Pater and father cognates; Senapati, a military commander. 5.—Senatus, the meeting of a Sena or army. 6.—Fadreins corresponds etymologically with paternus: patria with Sanskrit padram; client, one under protection. 7.—Romakas, an Asiatic people, allies of the Sakasenas. 8.—Chiefs regarded as providers. 9.—Servants regarded as persons maintained or nourished. 10.—The same notions (8 and 9) among the antient Sakasenas; paiti, a ration, the pay of a soldier; a knight's meat-home, and a knight's feud or fee synonymous; Stiernhelm's identification of feodum with food, a sagacious discovery in his age. 11.—Födeby, in Danish, equivalent to meat-home: Food is the Sanskrit bhat. 12.—Absurd derivations of feodum. 13.—Fundus, land, that which nourishes; farm, the same meaning. 14.—Patres, their early duties. 15.—Wages in kind; wealth of pastoral chiefs. 16.—Plunder, the support of magnificence. 17.—Phrases indicative of equality among military chiefs and their followers.

CHAPTER IV.

THE FEODAL SYSTEM PRIMITIVE AND UNIVERSAL. . .	57
--	----

- 1.—Property in the soil not originally vested in an individual. 2.—Feods known earlier than is assigned to them. 3.—Land shared by conquerors: 4.—Down to the 10th century. 5.—Sole property of land vested in the sovereign, a legal fiction. 6.—Wherever the chief characters of feudalism are found, there feudalism exists. 7.—Not original among the Germans. 8.—Known to the Asiatics before the departure of the Sakasenas to Europe. 9.—Count de Boulainvilliers' opinion of historical errors in regarding Gaul as the patrimony of the Merovingian princes. 10.—The growth of monarchical power. 11.—Condition of petty sovereigns. 12.—Hallam supposes the Scandinavians to have been ignorant of feudalism. 13.—The system in central Asia. 14.—Pinkerton, on its universality in the earliest ages; supported by St. Martin and Richardson. 15.—Patton, on its origin among pastoral nations. 16.—Tod, on the martial system of Rajasthan. 17.—Turkish timar; Mewar putta;

Persian jagir; fiefs of land held by military service. 18.—Feodal system found in Africa: 19.—Among the Caucasian mountains: 20.—In Livonia: 21.—In antient Britain: 22.—Probably not everywhere the same in all respects, and yet sufficiently similar to be deemed identical. 23.—Beneficium and munus merely translations of Teutonic words. 24.—Ascribed to the comparatively recent decrees of Roman emperors. 25.—Early migration of the German tribes. 26.—Offer of the Cimbri and Teutons to become vassals to Rome. 27.—Romans recovered their knowledge of civil liberty from their observation of it among the barbarians: 28.—Whom they began to imitate; comites copied from the gesidhas, or companions; Sanskrit etymology of the latter title. 29.—The Saxon gesidh, a nobleman, and the Sanskrit sithi, a disciple, their radical signification. 30.—Knight considered as a companion of the prince. 31.—Roman imperial comites and amici. 32 & 33.—Examples of Roman imitation. 34.—Selden and Palgrave on the origin of feods. 35.—Reasons why the German conquerors could not adopt Roman laws and customs.

CHAPTER V.

THE PRINCIPAL TERMS IN THE FEODAL LAW RESULT FROM THE NATURE OF THE MORAL BOND BETWEEN THE CHIEF AND HIS FOLLOWERS. HOMAGE AND FEALTY; OATHS OF ALLEGIANCE; AND DUTIES OF VASSALS. 100

1.—Feodal institutions traceable in Scandinavia. 2.—Frequent allusions to them in ancient compositions of the Northern and Germanic nations; the military companions of the Germans are the same as the Sanskrit sithis. 3.—Instances of feodal usages: Pit and Gallows. 4.—Treason and Cowardice. 5.—Ancient oath of fealty. 6.—Ambacti, ambatscia, and ambassador. 7.—Oaths of allegiance, —a Saxon, Frank, Norman; Modern allegiance not founded on Gothic constitutions: Wapentake, View of Frank Pledge, Hundred Court. 8.—Troth, truage; Drost, a governor; Gograff, antrustio, druerie. 9.—War-leader, army leader, various names of; War shield, and custom of summoning followers; the bell-house of the Saxons, tincl du roi, &c.: herberge, heristall, stations of the tribe or army. 10.—Land substituted for food or military rations; the Northern veisla, a banquet, answered to feodum, and the Rajpoot putta. 11.—The veisluman, or vassal. 12.—Len, lehn, &c., answering to loan; names of fiefs. 13.—Lords of such loans. 14.—Bonds or land owners. 15.—Derivations of allodium. 16.—Udell succession, Fowd of Zetland. 17.—Power of the aldoras.

CHAPTER VI.

	Page
THAT THE ANGLO-SAXONS, IN PARTICULAR, POSSESSED ALL THE CHIEF INCIDENTS OF THE FEODAL SYSTEM	140

- 1.—Munus and beneficium were displaced by the Teutonic term, because they did not convey the same idea; Felon, properly fellon, an enemy. 2.—Traces of feodality in the Saxon codes numerous. 3.—It was known to the ancient Britons; its origin, and the reason of its continuance and universality. 4.—Robbery honourable. 5, and seqq.—Particular incidents of feodality in the Saxon codes.

CHAPTER VII.

TITLES OF THE POSSESSORS OF SUPREME AUTHORITY .	168
---	-----

- 1.—Nobles, edelings, athelings, libertines. 2.—Youths, juvenes, knights; Ignobles. 3.—Signification of the termination -ing, -inus, &c.; Lordings. 4.—Lassi, handicraftsmen; theows and thumen. 5.—Rex. 6.—The manner in which all titles and appellations originally came to be applied, adopted, and generally used. 7.—Titles of Sovereigns. 8.—Diar. 9.—Aldor, a rex. 10.—Rex same as rakshi, and reg- as raja. Brahmanic derivation. 11.—Thiudans, a king; the title of Theodoric. 12.—Theoden, a lord. 13.—Judge, a military title; doomers. 14.—Rectors. 15.—Terms for kingdom mostly denote power or people, not territory. 16.—KING; importance of the etymology. 17.—Hendinos, in old Burgundian, a king; the same word as the Latin centenus. 18.—Kindins, Gothic, the same as hendinos. 19.—Cyning, a king, derived from cyn. 20.—Synonymes of king. 21.—Its true etymon. 22.—Hunnones and hundreders. 23.—Multitude of kings. 24.—Mistakes as to the splendour of the rank. 25.—DUKE. 26.—Hofding, Captain. 27.—Kings turned to jarls. 28.—QUEEN, Drottinn, Lady, Dame, Frau. 29.—Chieftain, hofding, captain. 30.—Prince. 31.—Atheling. 32.—Earl. 33.—Viscount.

CHAPTER VIII.

TITLES OF ASSOCIATES OR COMPANIONS	227
--	-----

- 1.—GRAFF, reve, sheriff; headborough; borsholder. 2.—Gesidh, gesindo, titles of nobility equal to count. 3.—Leod, a chief; court of the leodes, court leet; court baron; socage tenure; soc, sac; frank firm; sithessoen. 4.—Sidesman; bye laws, burlaw-men; sithesmen, gesidhesmen, sidesmen. 5.—Gisindo, grafio, gravio. 6.—Tungreve, Mayor. 7.—Bailiff.

CHAPTER IX.

	Page
HOUSEHOLD DIGNITIES AND OFFICES, HIGH AND LOW.	242

1.—PALATINE or PALACE COUNTS. Origin of the names of buildings, &c. 2.—Palace. 3.—Tower, Castle. 4.—Comes palatii; henchman. 5.—STEWARD, spencer, larderer. 6.—BUTLER, pincerna, bouteiller; skinker; byrel; seneschal; tapster; dapifer; dishbearer. 7.—Graff, greve, gerefa. 8.—MARQUIS, banner lords. 9.—Lords Marches. 10.—Senior, senhor. 11.—Constable and Marshal. 12.—MARSHAL, horse keeper; horse page, horse knave, avenor, hostler, farrier. 13.—Treasurer. 14.—Commodore, Ducarius, Admiral; Valvasor.

CHAPTER X.

TITLES FROM PERSONAL ACCIDENTS AND ATTRIBUTES.	300
--	-----

1.—BARON. 2.—Man, 3.—a Vassal. 4.—Barones, farones, varones. 5.—Vir. 6.—Richmen or barons. 7.—Highmen, nobility. 8.—Goodmen, fighters, knights. 9.—Boni homines, prodes hommes. 10.—Laird. 11.—hersir. 12.—frey herr. 13.—barne. 14.—beorn. 15.—sire, siresse. 16.—sennorio. 17.—Knights. 18.—child, baba, infanta; dans, donzello. 19.—Bachelor, chevalerie. 20.—haigstalders, haistaldi. 21.—Esquire. 22.—shieldbearer, sergeants. 23.—Gentleman. 24.—Vavasor, vicedomini, vidame; franklin. 25.—Commoner.

CHAPTER XI.

CONCLUSION	365
----------------------	-----

1.—Derivative titles; Banneret. 2.—Baronet.

APPENDIX.

RIGS MAL; AN ALLEGORICAL ACCOUNT OF THE ORIGIN OF RANKS AND TITLES, COMPOSED IN THE SEVENTH OR EIGHTH CENTURY	373
ADDITIONAL NOTES.	386
GLOSSARIAL INDEX.	397

1877

1878

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

REPORT OF THE
COMMISSIONER OF THE
LAND OFFICE
IN RESPONSE TO A RESOLUTION
PASSED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
MAY 11, 1877

1879

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

REPORT OF THE
COMMISSIONER OF THE
LAND OFFICE
IN RESPONSE TO A RESOLUTION
PASSED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
MAY 11, 1877

1880

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

REPORT OF THE
COMMISSIONER OF THE
LAND OFFICE
IN RESPONSE TO A RESOLUTION
PASSED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
MAY 11, 1877

ORIGINES PATRICIÆ,

&c. &c. &c.

CHAPTER I.

Asiatic Origin of European Titles.

- 1.—Historical research extended and facilitated by modern philology. 2.—The primary import of titular honours ascertainable by etymology.
- 3.—Prevailing errors of heraldic and legal authors and lexicographical etymologists in regard to titles. 4.—Selden misled by false philology.
- 5.—His Titles of Honor defective before the 5th century. 6.—Ill consequences of supposing primitive nations to have borrowed their ordinary words from each other. 7.—Classical and Teutonic languages coeval; first population of Europe. 8.—Importance of etymology as a science; Dr. Grimm's Canon of Consonantal Transition. 9.—Antiquity of Sanskrit. 10.—Closer affinity of Anglo-Saxon than Old German and Gothic with Sanskrit. 11.—Asiatic traditions apparently relating to early tribes settled in Europe. 12.—The Sakas and Sakasenas, now called Saxons.

1. THE discovery of the intimate dependence of the European family of languages upon the Sanskrit, and the profound investigations of Rask, Grimm, Bopp, and other continental scholars, have completely changed the direction of etymological research, and elevated Teutonic philology to the rank of a science. Assisted by the monuments of history, we are now enabled to speculate in the darkest ages, with the certainty of obtaining reasonable results in many of the questions, which have hitherto remained un-

CHAP.
I.

Historical research assisted by scientific etymology.

CHAP.
I.

answerable. To ascertain with precision, the ideas which were attached to terms by those who first used them, or through whom they have descended with additional, altered, or doubtful import, is most assuredly a necessary preliminary to a knowledge of the light, in which the things so signified, were regarded by their denominators. In words, expressing the first wants of man, the parts of the body, and the first relations of society, and, generally those which belong to laws, institutions, and the older customs of a nation, we may expect to learn, by means of the etyma, the particular or technical sense of the term when it became appropriated to one purpose. The most distinguished writers on the laws and institutions, of which the ancient terms have been preserved, are constantly found endeavouring to detect their primitive signification, not out of an idle curiosity, but a well grounded conviction, that a knowledge of the original import of the term is conducive to a fuller, if not a perfect knowledge of the subject itself.*

*Primary import of titles, as-certainable by etymology, and necessary to understand the ranks
denoted.*

2. An inquiry into the origin of titles of nobility is essentially an investigation into the primitive acceptation of words. It is impossible to understand the nature of the rank, on its first acquiring political distinction, if we are ignorant of the meaning of its appellation. The name and the thing designated are inseparably connected in the first stage of their existence. Through the vicissitudes of language or manners, each may have ascended to a higher grade, or sunk to a lower, and for its denomination other uses may have been found. Were it not so, the assurance is by no means contemptible, that an archaic appellation has withstood the assaults of time, or that arbitrary custom has not willed it another condition of its existence. Changes of this kind, and the extent of them, are discovered by etymology, for it can admit of no doubt, that those who found it necessary to distinguish the orders of society by separate appellations, employed such only as conveyed an exact idea of their nature, as it was then understood. An opinion of this kind is unquestionably the reason, that in all treatises on nobility, the etymology of its titles is found to constitute the earliest subject of consideration.

* So Judge Blackstone often appears to think; and particularly where, treating on the descent of the crown, he says, "Harold II. usurped the crown; and almost at the same instant came on the Norman invasion: the right to the crown being all the time in Edgar, surnamed Atheling, which signifies in the Saxon language, illustrious or of royal blood."—Comm. I. p. 198. What atheling does signify will be shewn; what the learned Judge has explained is not the Saxon, but the low Latin Clytus, which appears for Atheling in the Monkish historians, who were equally unacquainted with Saxon.

3. One prevailing fault vitiates all the works that have hitherto been undertaken in illustration of the rise and progress of titles of honor. The writers occupying themselves with orthographical coincidences in languages, have neglected to institute a comparison of terms belonging to the same root in the cognate dialects. Even in works professedly etymological, and published several years after the promulgation of Dr. Grimm's canon of the changes to which the mute consonants conform in their transition through the Indo-European languages, a blind dependence is still placed upon conjectural etymology, in cases where certainty was no longer of difficult attainment.* We are,

Erroneous investigations of heraldic and professional authors.

* The following etymologies of "baron" are transcribed as favourable specimens from Dr. Webster's Dictionary published in 1828, and Dr. Richardson's published in 1836. The canon was promulgated in 1822, but these gentlemen seem to know nothing about it: the Sanskrit is false, and the reference to the Shemitic questionable:—

"BARON. Fr. baren; Sp. baron or varon; It. barone; Sansc. bareru and bhartā, a husband. This word in the middle ages was written bar, ber, var, baro, paro, viro, virro, viron. It is the vir of the Latins, Sax. wer; Ir. fir, fear; W. gwr for guir, gevir. The Saxon wer, L. vir, is doubtless the Shemitic geber, a man, so named from his strength."—W.

"BARON. Fr. baron; It. barone; Sp. baron. Etymologists have written very unsatisfactorily about this word. Tooke derives it from the Goth. baig-an—('A baron is an armed, defenceful or powerful man.') See Spelman and Vossius."—R.

CHAP.
I.

therefore, without any guide in an interesting branch of knowledge.

*Selden, misled by false
philology.*

4. Selden, it is true, compares the ranks denoted by titles of honor in different countries, but he derives each term without reference to the sense in which it was understood, whether as a title or a simple word, by the several nations to whom it belonged. Thus, for instance, he endeavours to connect bachellor, a title common to the South Western States, with the appellation of a class of Greek soldiers in the lower empire, without trying the value of the word in each, and without enquiring what assistance could be derived from the Teutonic designations of the same rank. This great man was misled by the false philology of his age. With a sufficient stock of the kind of erudition requisite for the purpose, he fails for the most part, when he investigates the primary import of the names on which he is engaged, and which he found consecrated to the most illustrious stations of human life. Associating the present splendour of the rank with its denomination, and generally imagining that a grand or a reverential idea was constantly annexed to the term under examination, he seeks for its etymon in the same or some foreign language, regulating his choice by the external similitude between the title and the supposed original. Other etymologers have pursued the same course, and few, if any, of those who particularly directed their attention to titles of honor, have done more than implicitly adopt the erroneous results of his inquiries. The progress of society, independently of the philosophical etymology of its terms, suggests a different origin of patrician appellations. The humble canoe of the skin-clad savage grew by degrees into the tall ship; the cudgel of the primitive righter of village strifes became the mace of the war chief, which the art of the goldsmith eventually fashioned into a sceptre; the plumed helmet was once an iron skull-cap, and the imperial crown is no other than the same skull-cap lightened with perforations, and glittering with jewels. As the useful and the necessary precede the agreeable and ornamental in the household of a prudent family, so it has been in the arrangement of society; its first officers were indispensable; their utility rendered them permanent, and they gradually subsided into the decorative order of nobility.

5. Nothing can be more satisfactory than the profound disquisitions of this learned writer on the condition of nobility subsequent to the settlement of the States of Europe on the basis of the Gothic conquests. All before this period is conjectural, or sustained by a false etymology. It was a strange delusion in a man like Selden, to imagine that the Northern Warriors, who established their own institutions on the site of the Roman Law, which they swept away,* copied the usages of the vanquished—that they imitated the manners of a people whose luxury and effeminacy they must have regarded with contempt, and that, owing only a reasonable submission to their elected chiefs, they immediately abolished their vernacular titles, consecrated by the remotest antiquity, and expressive of ideas related to freedom, in order to adopt those of slaves who acknowledged the will of the sovereign to be the supreme law.† This etymological system prevented him from perceiving that the titles of the empire were servile copies or inadequate translations of terms, with which an acquaintance had been acquired in the German wars, and which, significant of feudal relations, could not be the property of a people who for centuries had so completely lost all knowledge of the system of feods as to look upon the polity of the German nations as an extraordinary phenomenon of the moral world. Considering Selden, however, as having most fully and satisfactorily treated the subject of titles of

His Titles of Honour defective before the 5th Cent.

* It was totally forgotten from the settlement of the conquerors in the fifth century, until a copy of the digests was accidentally discovered at Amalfi in the twelfth.

† “Quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem.”—See the quotations in Blackstone, Comm. I. 74.

CHAP.
I.

honor, after the overthrow of the empire, no attempt will be made in the following disquisitions to tread in his steps; but there are, nevertheless, facts, collected by this diligent inquirer, which it will be essential to employ occasionally in illustration: and these will be carefully assigned to the proprietor. For though two men, when they are occupied with the same subject, may remember the same passages, and in consulting the same books will unavoidably make a very similar choice, it is but just to give him the preference who first showed the way.

Primitive words.

6. Analogous to the fundamental error in philology, by which the staple words of a tongue are referred for their originals to the strange languages of remote and, it may have been, unknown people, and by which whole nations are presumed to have borrowed the signs of their own ideas from dialects which they neither spoke nor understood,* is that of regarding archaic titles as expressive of the honor and respect paid to their bearers. Instead of this being the case, it will be found that generally they are significant of some circumstances in which the primitive bearers were placed in relation to the people or the state, and sometimes to themselves. The consequence of this mistake is to invalidate just analogy, to contradict history by false interpretations, and to limit the existence of the oldest institutions in Europe to a date comparatively recent.

Classical & Teutonic tongues coetaneous.

7. Unassisted reason assures us that the people who first passed the land marks of Asia and Europe brought with them their own forms of speech, and consequently their own appellations of the leaders who directed their enterprise, whether that were a sudden incursion of freebooters,

* Adelung, after showing that the nose had been called by the same name among half a dozen antient people in the north, notices the common derivation of the name from the Latin nasus. His remark is of more general application. If, he says, nasus be the origin of the word, we are to conclude that all these nations were unable to give their noses a name until they had learned what to call them from the Romans.

or the gradual progress of pastoral tribes. As the languages at present spoken in this quarter of the world, still find the models of their materials, and even of their internal structure in the Sanskrit, we can have little doubt that the names of offices, now become titles of nobility, were introduced at the same time as the bulk of their words, which like them, yet bear the Asiatic complexion imperfectly concealed under their western costume. The epoch of the first population of Europe is not to be determined. We, however, know more than enough to overturn the theories of modernisers,—that 2600 years ago the Roman name began to be feared South of the Danube, and that the North and East of Europe were occupied by Scythians, who were dispossessed by the Getæ, about 300 years before the Christian era; and we also know that, nearly at the same time, two tribes of people from the borders of the Baltic Sea, descended upon the Roman coasts. “If, therefore,” says Col. Vans Kennedy, in one of those erudite works which have contributed to effect the revolution in philology, “the authority of ancient authors* is esteemed preferable to the mere conjectures of modern writers, it must follow that 300 years before the Christian era, the country which extends from the confines of Macedonia, along the Hellespont, Propontis and Euxine Sea to the Borysthenes, and from the Hellespont and Euxine on both sides of the Danube to the frontiers of the Suevi, were occupied by a simple race of people, who were Thracians, and not Scythians: nor can it admit of a single doubt that the Thracians derived their origin from Asia Minor, and not from Scythia, eastern or western.”†

First population of Europe.

8. The happy conjunction of the study of Sanskrit with that of the Teutonic branch of languages, has solved a problem, which the wide domain of the Thracians alone would

*Transition of mute
consonants.*

* “Strabo, VII. p. 30. Pausanias, Attic. c. 9.”

† Researches into the Ancient and Hindù Mythology, p. 95.

CHAP.
I.

Grimm's Canon of Consonan-tal Transition.

not have accomplished. As the Sanskrit is the parent of all,* it is no longer difficult to explain why the Old Norse or Icelandic, the language of Scandinavia, "where Roman foot never trod," bears a close affinity to the Roman language, both possessing words in common of the same import, and varied in orthography upon an unvarying principle, presenting a uniform unlikeness, and why other orthographic changes, of like uniformity, are found in Old German and Anglo-Saxon. In the knowledge of the nature of these changes the rule founded, by which the modern philologist traces the affinities of the words spoken by people, remote by geographical position, and still farther removed by mutual ignorance of their respective languages, manners, customs, and, it may be, existence. Frequent reference, in pursuits of this kind, is therefore made to the discoveries of Bopp of the affinities of vowels, and to the law or canon of consonantal transition through the chief Indo-European languages, promulgated by Dr. Grimm in 1822; but to exhibit it in a tabular form will probably facilitate acquiescence in results, which are so completely at variance with those of preceding speculators respecting the import of titles, and the terms belonging to the institutions connected with them. Many repetitions, and much labour will thus be obviated, and there will be less necessity for insisting upon the probable correctness of views, which are not directly stated by historians, but which are still corroborated by their facts. According to this canon, as a general expression, a classical aspirate corresponds with a

* This may not be strictly true; but as Sanskrit literature is unquestionably much more ancient than the oldest of the Teutonic remains, and as also it has been preserved in greater abundance and perfection, there is a convenience in referring to it as if it were the parent, instead of being what is more probable, only a sister dialect. If we do not find the radical signification of a term in any of the European class, and succeed in discovering it in Sanskrit, we may consider the latter as the original without real mischief, although in point of fact it is only a surviving relation.—See M. Dieffenbach's review of Prof. Pott, in the Heidelbergisch. Jahrbüch. 1839, p. 450.

Gothic medial and an old German tenuis, and so on as follows:—

CHAP.
I.

Gr. & Lat.	Goth. & A-Sax.	O. High Ger.
aspirate	medial	tenuis
tenuis	aspirate	medial
medial	tenuis	aspirate.

Or, more particularly, the correspondence among the labials, linguals and gutturals in the same languages, are shown thus: a Greek P or Lat. F answering to the Gothic B and a German P, and so on:—

Gr.	Got.	O.H.G.	Gr.	Got.	O.H.G.	Gr.	Got.	O.H.G.
P	F	B,V	T	Th	D	K	H,G	G
B	P	F	D	T	Z	G	K	Ch
F	B	P	Th	D	T	Ch(lat.H)	G	K

This canon, according to which, in the words of Dr. Grimm, the identity of words depends upon their outward unlikeness,* overturns by far the greater part of the etymologies that have hitherto been received as established verities, and creates an immense gap in this department of literature. As it is invariable in all cases where words spring from the same source, it is of admirable use in determining affinities and the order of descent; but to obtain the primary import of the connected terms, recourse must be had to their common parent. On this account, it is proposed in the following disquisitions to push the research

* Deutsche Grammatik, vol. I. p. 584. The canon may be read thus: a Greek or Latin word in which a p occurs, will have its corresponding Gothic or Anglo-Saxon with an f in the same position as the p, and its old High German correspondent will have b or v in the same position. Generally the Sanskrit corresponds with the Greek: thus—

Skt. Gr. L. G. A.-S. O.H.G. Engl.
Pada; Pous, pod-os; Pes, ped-is; fot-us; fot (plu. fet); vuoz; foot.

The Gr. s=w Got; the Lat. cu (qv)=hw, Got. & A.-S. wh Engl. and w Germ. The Gothic th mostly answers to the Anglo-Saxon dh. Dr. Grimm says "Words in which two changes of consonants agree with the rule (τρεχειν, thragjan — ποδες, fotjus) are doubly certain; those in which one consonant agrees, the other varies, are suspicious; still more into the Sanskrit wherever practicable, for it is not imagined that every attempt to detect an origin will be attended with success. The advantages to be derived from this source result from the ease and certainty with which, in this language, every word may be traced to its elements or the simplest form of expressing the idea of conception. Farther etymology cannot pass; for it does not seem likely that we shall discover why particular forms are appropriated to particular ideas.

CHAP.
I.

9. About 3000 years it is supposed must have elapsed since the Sanskrit ceased to be a living language.* Col. Vans Kennedy, whose profound erudition entitles his opinion to the greatest weight, believes it to have been Babylonian, the immediate parent of the dialects of Asia-Minor, whence the Thracian, now extinct, was derived. The latter, he also thinks, was the original of the Northern and Teutonic tongues, and the Latin the parent of French, Italian and Spanish, according to the following scheme, detached from his tables of the filiation of languages :†— suspicious are those in which the consonants remain unaltered in the three languages. In this case, either all relationship fails—as (A.S.) pāds, paduas, callis, παῖς, dolor; or else one language has borrowed from the other; thus scriban is scribere itself, frucht is fructus. Hence we see that in examining the derivations of words, we have less to inquire into the resemblance of the consonants than into the order of their descent in the above series, an order which allows neither of inversion nor alteration. Thus, if in an O. H. G. word we find a p, and in the same position in the corresponding Gothic word, a b, and in the Latin an f, we may conclude that these three words descend from a common stock, of which each language possesses its peculiar derivative, unborrowed from any of the others. If, on the contrary, we find an f in High German answering to a b in Gothic, and p in Latin, the order in which these letters appear is contrary to that pointed out by the table, although, abstractedly considered, they are truly related. A Greek τ requires a Gothic th, but the Gothic t instead of a Greek θ requires a δ; and thus the identity of the words depends upon their outward unlikeness.”

* “The oldest Persian writings reach back no farther than the ninth century, while the latest in Sanskrit and Zend extend at least several centuries before the Christian era.”—Wining, Manual of Compar. Philology, p. 27, 8.

† Researches into the origin of languages, p. 221.

10. The Anglo-Saxon agrees in more respects than the Old German with the Gothic, and it differs from both in a remarkable particular, which can scarcely be explained on the supposition that they are derived through a common medium from the Sanskrit. As an example, Dr. Grimm's case of the Greek odous (a tooth), and its etymological equivalents will answer:—

*Affinity of A.-Saxon
with Sanskrit stronger than that of Gothic and Old German.*

Gr. & Lat.	Gothic	O.H.G.	A.-Sax.	Engl.
odous (pl. odontes)	tunthus	zand	todh	tooth
dens (pl. dentes)

The Danish and Swedish tand agrees with the three first in taking the nasal, which is absent from the Saxon; and in noticing this very circumstance, it has been hastily concluded that the disagreement “is a modification on principles peculiar to the Saxon dialects.”* This is, to say the least, very questionable, because not only is dat, in Sanskrit, a tooth as well as dantah, the original of the Latin, Gothic, and German words, but six of the eight cases of dantah reject the n, which forms no part of the dhata, root, or crude state of the noun and its verb, which is das, to bite, the evident original of the Greek singular.†

In a number of other words, Anglo-Saxon, Gothic, German, and Norse, there is the same difference, the first being

* Blackwood, for 1841, p. 203.

† Professor Pott, who regards the n as an additional letter in the word, strangely classes dat, danta, and their cognates or derivatives under the root ad, comedere, to eat. “Dat (deus) in Compp. ist Particul. mit Verstümmelung vorn; eben so Lat. d-ent. Gr. od-ont. Mit neuen Ansatzbuchstaben S. dant-a, Pers. dendân, Oss. dend-eg; Litt. dantis; Goth. tunthus.”—Etymologische Forschungen, th. I. s. 242. Mr. Wilson refers it to dam, to tame, subdue.

CHAP.
I.

without the nasal, which the others have inserted, not retained ; for instance, the Gothic has gundh, Norse gunni, and O. Germ. gund, war; but the Saxon has gudh, which is the Sanskrit yudh, to fight, yuddha, war, battle. Again, there are a number of words which in Sanskrit are characterized by the guttural nga, which in Greek and Gothic are written with gg or gk, but which in the other languages take ng. No particular stress is laid upon this circumstance, but still it should be taken into consideration with the former, and with the fact, that an astonishing number of words exist in Anglo-Saxon and English, which are scarcely altered in orthography from the Sanskrit, and still less in signification. To insert these, or any considerable portion of them, is not to be undertaken here,* but there are too many to admit a supposition that they are accidental.

Asiatic
Traditions

11. The inference seems to be that the Saxons did not derive their language through the same medium as the others, and even that it was more nearly related than they to the Sanskrit. Very antient traditions of the Hindûs are extant in the Puranas, respecting the wars and dispersion of people on the confines of India, whose appellations bear a striking resemblance to those of European nations. The family of Gautama or Jutama (lord or tamer of the cow), whose mode of worship was the asvamedha, or sacrifice of a horse, remind us of the Gothones and Jutones, Goths and Jutes, and their sacrifices of the horse. Among their allies were the Romakas, the Sakas, and a tribe of them called Sakasenas. Others relate to the Danavas or children of Danu, who appears to Danur, the first king of

* Several cases of the kind occur in the subsequent pages, particularly in treating of the A.-S. title of honor gesidh. It may be incidentally noticed that the A. S. also sometimes differs from the Latin in this particular respect ; for instance, the A. S. lidh, gentle, is the Latin lent-us slow, Germ. lind ; soft gentle, in O Norse lin-r, id., but the Sanskrit root, to which all must be referred, is lut, sometimes rut, to sink from weakness, to shine, where t, being a cerebral, may account for the difference. The Gr. lit-os, simple, seems to answer to the A.-Saxon. The Gothic has been lost.

the Danes. These came into India under the command of Beli, who was then named Dana-vendra, as if the Danes and the Vendils of Jutland were allegorized. The story of the Strirajya or government of women, may not be unconnected with the Kuennar, or nation of women to the east of the Gulf of Bothnia. In addition to these coincidences, there is the tradition that Varaheswara, the lord of the boar, once reigned over a people in a remote country in the west, where their posterity still remain under the form of Varahas or boars, as if this tradition related to the Wagri, a general name of the Scandinavians, among whom, as well as among the Saxons and Germans, the boar was a sacred animal, of which the effigy profusely decorated their armour and ensigns. Another tradition is occupied with the divine cow Savila, and we find in Scandinavian fable, a supernatural cow, named Sibilia, held in great veneration by the Swedes of Gothland.*

Things of this kind are certainly curious, but it is dangerous to build a theory upon them, for it may just as well have happened that the tales were constructed upon imperfect accounts of Europe, as that the people so named are identical with the Asiatic settlers in Europe. An exception, however must be made of the Sakasens.

12. By some writers the Asiatic settlers in Europe are termed "Sacæ," and by others "Sakasens,"† as being the progenitors of the whole Teutonic family; but if that were the case, those settlers, as is most probable, consisted not of one but of several tribes, speaking languages radically the same, but differently characterized. There also seem

Sakas and Sakasenas.

* Sagann af Ragnar Lodhbrok, c. 8 and 9.—Also Sibylia. Biörner, in the preface to his Kämpathattor, thinks this cow is the same with the goddess Cybele.

† Sakah, inhabitants of Saka, which is also the appellation of any prince who gives his name to a particular era. Generally, Salivahana is the sovereign to whom the term refers, and his followers are called Sakah. The root is sak, to be able, and the initial is slightly aspirated, but does not exactly sound like sh.

CHAP.
I.

to have been several immigrations of these mixed tribes : Scandinavian tradition speaks of the flight of Odin and his Tyrks, or Tyrians, from the power of the Romans, and their occupation of the Northern regions ; the date of this event, about 70 years before Christ, is so recent that it is impossible to consider it as the first settlement of Asiatics in those parts. The Nemet Sass, or German Saxons, as they are termed by their Slavonic neighbours, have been long settled in the province of Scepus to the north of Hungary, under Mount Krapak ; but there seem to be no very good grounds for believing with D'Anville, that they are descendants of Saxons transported thither by Charlemagne. They may have been left behind on the original march, while the great body of the here, or host, pursued their fortunes more to the north-west. Added to this, and concurring with the Oriental appellation of the Danavendra, we find the Vendils or Vandals, at the north of Jutland, and along the southern shore of the Baltic, at the same time that the Venedi were on the shores of the Adriatic, and that the Anglo-Saxons knew the Mediterranean as the Wendel Sæ, or Sea of the Vandals. The language of the Venedi was Slavonic, but the Slavonic is also related to the Sanskrit.

As the Asiatics, Thracians, or Sakasens, long retained their native manners and customs, we may reasonably expect to find among them the same appellations of their chief governors and magistrates. And this is the case, with the exception of the Romans, whose destiny conducted them to a more populous region, where immediately beginning to found cities, they necessarily adopted a form of Government suitable to their new circumstances. The feudal polity, under which they had lived like all their Asiatic brethren, was dropped on the expulsion of their kings, and the influence of the municipalities substituted the dominion of the senate, a body purely aristocratical. Nothing can conduce so much to an erroneous conception of the Germanic institutions as reference to the Romans for an explanation of the terms by which they denoted and continue to designate the first orders of their society. By tracing them, when possible, to the Sanskrit, or, when that resource fails, by pursuing them through their systematic modifications in the different dialects, we may often obtain the signification which was originally attached to them; and as the inventors of words did not apply them to the things which they were not intended to express, we acquire a knowledge of the nature of the office or rank to which each title was annexed. If we do not find it enveloping the gorgeous ideas with which modern rank is invested, we are assured in recompense of our trouble, that the terms now appropriated to ornament, were originally applied to useful and sometimes necessary members of society. By the same process we are enabled to relieve several happy conjectures from the doubts which have been thrown over them, by men who have reasoned in the confidence of a false philology; and at the same time, to award to the appellations of nobility an originality and an antiquity far surpassing the utmost reach of preceding inquirers, although possessed of infinitely more learning and patience of investigation.

When etymology corresponds with known facts and existing circumstances, we have a criterion of its truth, without the necessity of recurring to Grimm's canon, with which, however, it will be found to agree. When the correspondence is found to take place with a great number of such facts and circumstances, it is not unreasonable to rely upon etymology for other facts, which are but indifferently established. If, for instance, some orders of men are denominated from the different appellations of a house, and we find them at the same time described as household officers, it is a just inference when another denomination is traced to the appellation of a house, if there be nothing contradictory in it, that the persons to whom it was applied, were domestics, although we have nothing further to confirm that inference.

It is believed that a new, and, it may be, a useful light, is now thrown upon very ancient titles, designations of office, and terms connected with legal and other customs ; many of which have occasioned great perplexity through interpretations that have been founded upon erroneous derivations. The thing and its appellation have thus been frequently at variance ; but by proceeding upon rational principles instead of conjectures based upon the apparent resemblance of words, it will be found that the titles of chiefs, the denominations of subjects and dependants, the appellations of their lands and tenure of them, the pay or recompence of their services, and, saving a few titles drawn from personal qualities, the names of some inferior dignities—are all uniform in their tendency to a primary signification, connected with that first law of nature which directing men to preserve themselves is the foundation of municipal society.

CHAP.
I.

CHAPTER II.

That the chiefs of the Sakasens and the first Romans were distinguished by titles significant of the care due from them to their followers.

- 1.—Aldor, and Elder, originally the appellation of a chief without reference to age or other bodily accident. 2.—Invariably used in the sense of a prince. 3.—Is the etymological cognate of the Latin altor. 4.—Aldii and other terms derived from the same root. 5.—Aldor-men kings or chiefs. 6.—Attaman, what. 7.—Altheirrin, chiefs of the Germans. 8.—False derivations of Alderman; old age not esteemed by rude nations. 9.—Ealdor, Alder and Elder were not used as adjectives, but in their own substantive character. 10.—Terms and names of places allusive to the residence or occupancy of the aldor; alodh, or ale, liquid nutriment; alod and alodium, land so called from serving for alimony; franc-aloud, free alimony. 11.—Feodal lords among the Rajpoots of Mewar.

1. In the German and English languages there is an archaic word, of which the derivation, and consequently the true import, have been widely mistaken, but which, employed as a title at the dawn of feudalism upon Europe, still conveys a clear notion of the bond that united the chief and his followers. This significant term is Elder, a ruler, which, even in its less deceptive form of Aldor, in Anglo-Saxon, has been universally regarded as an adjective, used substantively to denote a person advanced in years, and, when applied to a man in authority, as implying one that has been raised to eminence on account of his age and experience.

2. Aldor, or Ealdor, which is precisely the same word, with a dialectic orthography, invariably occurs in the sense of a prince, a ruler, or a chief, but is never found to denote an old man :

CHAP.
II.

ALDOR.

ELDER.

CHAP.
II.

Hy on wig getawum
wirth the thinceath eorla geæhtlan
huru se Aldor deah
se tham heathe rincum hider wisade."

They in their war habits appear worthy of earls' possessions :
at least the aldor is powerful who directed hither
these stately warriors.

Beowulf, 773.

As an epithet proper to a powerful monarch, it is applied to king Hrodhgar, or Roger, in the same antient poem :

Sele weard aseted
sundor nytte beheold
ymb Aldor Dena.

The appointed hall warder held his peculiar office about the aldor of the Danes.

L. 1327.

In the same sense and orthography it is found in the Laws which the "aldoras" enacted for Kent in 673 ; but by a mode of notation peculiar to the Anglo-Saxons, by which a long a, au, and a long o were represented by ea, the word is sometimes written ealdor, in Beowulf, but without altering the signification :

Nealles frætwe geaf Ealdor dugodhe."

Nor ornaments gave the Eldor to his nobility.

L. 5834.

It should also be observed that the manuscript of this poem is the work of two scribes, of whom he that wrote the earlier portion used aldor, and the other ealdor.

Altor.

3. Ealdor, more antiently and more conformably to the other dialects, aldor, employed to denote a chieftain, exactly corresponds in etymology and literal import with the Latin altor, one who provides the means of living, a nourisher, supporter, maintainer ; for as the Gothic ḍ constantly answers to the classical τ in cognate words, and as altor regularly proceeds from the verb ale-re, to nourish, so its equivalent aldor is regularly formed from the A.-S. verb ali-an (Goth. alj-an, O. H. G. ale-n, O. Norse ala), to nourish, feed, maintain. Of all these verbs the sensible idea is found in the Sanskrit alu, an edible root,* which is thus named from al, the verbal root, or simple expression of the abstract conception of the verb to have power—power to preserve, protect, maintain. In this sense the modern Germans retain the word.

* The arum campanulatum ; but in the modern dialects it is applied to the yam, the potato, and other esculents.

4. On this primitive signification of altor and aldor a number of words in Anglo-Saxon and Latin are dependent. The subjects of the aldor, in no distant age, were called aldii by the Latin writers for aldan in Saxon and alden in German, which, it will be perceived, is the equivalent of the Latin alti, the nourished, both being the participles of their respective verbs, and contracted in the very same manner, by the suppression of a middle vowel i.* Much after the same notion of men as the consumers of food, provided by a chief, one of the Sanskrit denominations of an army is chamuh, the eater. After the subjugation of Italy by the Lombards, the term alden was restricted to a class of people in a servile condition; but even in its Latinized form of aldii, whose progeny were the aldiones of

* In Latin alt-us is the contraction of alit-us, nourished; and in Gothic ald-s, that which is nourished, life, is contracted from alid-s, nourished. The Saxon and German words follow the same process. The existence of the part. alids is evidence that the Gothic possessed aljan, to nourish; yet Junius, in his note on the words “alidan stiur,” (the fattened calf, Luc. xv. 23.) attempts to derive it from the Greek aloain, to bruise corn.

The meaning of the root is alluded to in the Eddaic poems, where Alu-viss, in answer to a question what aul, ale, may be, replies that men name it aliment

“Öl heitir medh monnum.”

Thus there is more of truth than commonly believed in the jocular etymology of ale ab alendo. The mythological Aluiss appears to be an importation of the Saye Alavala, who, in the Indian system of fable, was the tutelary genius of gardens and orchards, that is of herbage and fruit, or vegetable nutriment. “The name Ala,” says Col. Wilford, “is produced into alavala, to denote the trench dug round trees for the purpose of watering them; and it seems to be the root of ‘αλωά, a vineyard or orchard; ‘αλωη, in the same sense; ‘αλονα, gardens, and ‘αλωευς, a gardener or husbandman.”—(Asiat. Res. III. p. 441.) To explain Alviss upon purely Icelandic principles is puerile.

CHAP.
II.ALDOR-
MEN.

the antient Laws,* the primitive force of the term as a participial noun is clearly discerned.

5. Though the title of aldor is given to a Danish king, in Beowulf, there is no direct testimony that it was ever recognized among the legitimate appellations of royalty in Scandinavia or in Jutland. It may, however, have been in use among the Danish islanders who joined the Anglen in the invasion of Britain,† and who came under the description of East Danes :—

Eow het secgan
sige drihten min Aldor East Dena
thæt he eower æthelu can.

My victorious lord
the Aldor of the East Danes, bids me to tell you that he knows your nobility.

Beow. 717.

6. Of its use among the Saxons there is abundant testimony. The Old Saxons (says Beda) had no kings, but a great many chiefs (“satrapas”) over their people. In time of war they drew lots, and that chief upon whom the lot fell they obeyed as their leader. On the return of peace, they resumed their former state, and were again chiefs of equal power. By a pleonasm these satrapæ or chiefs were occasionally in early times, but constantly after the Hepharchy, called Aldor-Men, or Ealdormen, as in king Alfred’s translation of this passage. On the same principle, it may be observed, was constructed the antient title of ataman or attaman, a chief of Cossacks, which consisting of the Sanskrit ad, eat, attum, to eat, and man, appears to denote the provider of edibles, the maintainer of his people.

Ataman.

7. The writer of the early portion of the Saxon Chronicle styles the two first kings of Wessex, “ealdormen,”‡ and the Laws of Kent are expressly said by king Lothaire

* Aldiones vel aldiæ ea lege vivant in servitute dominorum suorum, qua fiscalini vel liti vivant in Francia.—Const. Car. M. tit. 20.

† King Alfred’s Orosius, fo. 11, b.

‡ Her cwomon twegen ealdormen on Brytene.—Ann. 495.

and Edric, to be augmentations of the same laws which the aldoras had formerly enacted.* These aldoras were probably the same chiefs who are called ealdormen in the Chronicle. The antient princes of the Germans were styled altheirrin, not old lords, but protecting and maintaining lords, and in the rhyming legend of St. Aunon, the Roman senators are distinguished by this appellation, which is also that of the town councillors of Nordlingen in Suabia at the present day.†

Altheirrin.

8. As the Germanic nations, and, indeed, all antient people, attached precise notions to names and titles, and as the latter most commonly express the nature, quality, or some attribute of the office which they designate, it is often of importance to ascertain the original acceptation of their descriptive or distinguishing terms and appellations. The utility of appealing to etymology for this purpose was felt by the compiler of the code which bears the name of Edward the Confessor. He has endeavoured by this means to explain several archaic titles, but, as might be expected, his derivations are egregious failures, and except that of aldorman, have all been rejected by later etymologists, who contentedly adopt his opinion that it signifies a senior or aged person. In this number it is unpleasant to meet Judge Blackstone, who, having just observed truly, that “dignity and duty were never separated by our ancestors,” nevertheless, when speaking of earls, says that “they were called ealdormen, quasi elder-men, signifying the same as senior or senator among the Romans,” and “schiremen also, because they had each of them the civil government

* Hlothaire and Eadric cyningas ecton tha æ tha the heora (viz. thæs folces) aldoras ær geworhton.

† “Altherren.”—It is not to be denied that alt frequently signifies age; Goth. alds, A.-S. ald, Norse aldr, life, age; but this sense is secondary and derivative. Ald, alt, old implies so much of life as a person has prolonged by nutrition, from the first sense of ald, that which is nourished. The Saxon lif, Engl. life, to live, are cognates of the Latin vivere, from the Sanskrit jiv, live, the j becoming l in one language and v in the other.

CHAP.
II.

of a several division or shire.”* But it behoves more accurate inquirers to dismiss the foundation of this error with all expedition. The rude people who invented our words, depended upon bodily strength and agility for their livelihood and the continuance of their society. Those qualities were of the highest value to them as huntsmen, herdsman, and warriors. They were their virtues, and the possessors of them in an eminent degree became by the formal choice of the general body their leaders and princes,† while their men of dexterity, or handy men, were their wise men.‡ The opposite qualities were their vices, and such of the tribe as were weak, deformed, or otherwise unable to defend the state, were put to death.§ From this extreme policy we may infer the hazardous and precarious life of the first roamers of the European forests; but it forbids us to seek for a title of honor or office among the names of conditions and qualities, useless and burdensome, if not absolutely odious, to men occupied in the pursuit of game and perpetually engaged in hostile aggression and repulsion. Old age was held in no great esteem by a people whose very existence demanded the incessant exertion of bodily vigour, and whose labours, individual or collective for the support of life, would necessarily be augmented, and, perhaps obstructed, by subsisting the helpless. One of the laws ascribed to Alf, the pirate, is founded on the same principle.

* Comm. I. 397, 8.

† Duces ex virtute sumunt (Tacit. de Mor. Germ. c. 7, where virtue is strength and animal courage).

‡ Handugei, wisdom, in Gothic, from handus, the hand. Metaphysical etymology connects the names of abstract properties with matter. Wisdom is a cognate of the Latin visus, sight, from videre, to see, as wisdom from witan, to know, both being descendants of the Sanskrit veda, knowledge. He that could see with his bodily eyes, knew, and was wise; as in another respect, he that was able with hands was esteemed clever, a bad sense of wise.

§ Ignavos et imbelles et corpore infames, cœno ac palude, injecta insuper crate, mergunt.—Tacit. de M. G. c. 20.

He is said to have ordained that none should bind up a fresh wound until the same hour on the following day,* for only slight wounds would admit of the delay, and those who were much hurt would die in the interval. It was the same principle continued to the latest period of the feudal law, by which a tenant was forbidden to alienate his land without the consent of the lord, lest the latter should be provided with a tenant who was unable to discharge the military duties of the fief.† The same principle is said to have prevailed among the Buccaneers of the 17th and the Pirates of the 18th century, who, in order that their vessels might not be turned into hospitals after an engagement, threw overboard every one that could not rise from the deck. The same principle is found to be in operation among the savage tribes of southern Africa;‡ and, to terminate its history, it is the same principle which has prompted a parliamentary majority of the English aristocracy to direct that “food worse in quality, and less in quantity,” shall be administered to labourers whom disease, the feebleness of age, and the sudden visitations of God have rendered a charge upon their parishes. As this feeling, which awoke in the first age of society, still operates, we look in vain for a time when hunters and warriors elected the aged and decrepid to be the directors and conductors of their dangerous enterprises. Dr. Doig pronounces the Germans to have been “rather savages than barbarians,”§ but their treatment of those who were useless and burdensome to the community is no proof of it, or there is no

* Einginn skylle sar binda fyrr enn ad jafnleingd annar dags.—Alfs og Recka hanns Saga, c. 11.

† Blackstone, Comm. II. 57, 287.

‡ “From apprehensions of nocturnal attacks from lions, the wretched hordes of Caffres place their aged and infirm nearest the entrance of the cave or covert where they usually sleep, in order that the least valuable may first fall a prey, and serve as a ransom for the rest.”—South African Journal, 1843.

§ Two Letters on the Savage State, to lord Kaimes, Lond. 1792, p. 44.

CHAP.
II.

difference between man in a savage and man in a high state of civilization.

9. The Saxon compiler shows himself perfectly conscious of the radical defect in his etymology, when he says that the greves were denominated eldere men, not on account of their old age, but their wisdom.* A grammatical objection, of itself fatal to the derivation, would naturally occur to a Saxon, though overlooked by his successors: neither ealdor nor aldor is the comparative of eald, old, but yldre, which makes in the superlative yldest and ieldest; while, on the other hand, ealdor is a noun substantive belonging to a regular form of declension, and making its plural in ealdoras or aldoras, just as yldre makes its plural in yldran, when it signifies, not older men, but fore fathers. A Saxon would also know that if the adjective were part of the compound, it must appear in one of these forms, ealdman, or se ealdaman, or se yldraman, which never occur, because gomela is the proper term for what these etymologists suppose ealdorman to denote: and gomela, a diminutive of guma, a man, like the Latin homunculus, teaches us the degree of estimation in which the inventors of Saxon words held old men. Ine, king of the West Saxons, at the close of the 7th century, makes a pointed distinction between the noblemen called aldormen, and those who derived their nobility from age and experience: "I have enacted these laws (he says) with all my aldormen, and the oldest witan of

* "Vocabantur elderemen, non propter senectutem, sed propter sapientiam."—Leges Edw. Conf. c. 32. Roger Hoveden, p. 607, repeats this derivation, with the observation—"non propter senectutem, cum quidem adolescentes essent,"—since some may be young men. A similar deference to antient writers, followed by a reason, which in like manner implies the author's doubt of the soundness of their opinion, is found in Sallust. On the origin of the senate, he says, that persons whose bodies were weak through old age, but whose minds were strong in wisdom, were selected to consult for the commonwealth: these were called fathers, either from their age or the resemblance of their duties—"vel ætate, vel curæ similitudine." Bell. Catill. 6.

my nation, together with a large concourse of the servants of God,* that is, with the chiefs of the tribes, the counselors in law (legem scientes†), and the clergy. As the exact sense of this title of aldorman is important, and though any one of the foregoing remarks demolishes the old etymology, it may be further observed that the Anglo-Saxons called old age ealdung or ealdom (in Orosius eald dom), answering to the Gothic aldoma, which appears as the sense of “senectus” in Luc. I. 36., while the term for a chieftaincy was aldordom or ealdordom, the state, power, and condition of an Elder. The difference between the two terms is perceptible in king Alfred’s Orosius. The Romans, he says, fear that—

“Hyre weallas for ealdunge brosnian,”
Their walls for old age are decaying;

and immediately afterwards he adds—

“Hyre anweald is ma hreosende for eald dome.—”
Their empire is more likely to fall by old age.

Fo. 33.

On the other hand ealdordom is used for principatus in the passage relating to the appointment of decemvirs, of whom one was Claudius “se wæs onteonde ealdordom ofre tha othre,”—who arrogated dominion over the others.

10. Several antient names of places bear evidence of the presence of the aldor, such as the Scandinavian appellation of Ladoga, which was Aldeiborg, corresponding with the names of Altenburgh and Oldenburgh, the castle of an aldor, in several parts of Germany. The Spanish aldea, a

* Ealdormen and ieldestan witan. The Latin translation “Aldermanni et seniores sapientes,” is correct enough.

† The aldormen acted as judges, but were military men. Wita is connected with Goth. witodh, a law; and witheit is the appellation of the judicial council of Bremen. All are related to witan, to know. The Sanskrit veda, knowledge, and technically, the sacred law, is derived from vid, know, to wit, vetti, wotteth, knoweth. Col. Vans Kennedy has the following succession of cognates: “Sans. vidanti, Gr. εἰδovται, Lat. vident, A.-S. witon.”

CHAP.
II.

Allodium.

Alod.

village, and low Latin aldania, the appurtenance of a village, are also related to aldor and altor. As the Sanskrit al, also alam, be able, competent, powerful, is inflected alati or alate and so on, the connexion of the low Latin aletu-do, alimentum, alimonium, nourishment, aliment, alimony, and the Anglo-Saxon alodh, liquid nutriment, ale,* is still more clearly perceptible. Alauda, a Gallic appellation of a Roman Legion, belongs to the same class, and must have originally denoted a company of persons dependent on another for subsistence.† This idea of support, maintenance, and dependence for daily food, and that of supplying it, runs through several classes of words in the old languages: thus, in Sanskrit, bhara, that which supports; bharata, a servant; bharanium, wages; bharaniu, a master; bharatha, a king; bharta, a husband; bharia, a wife; bhara, a burden; bhrita, hired; bhriti, wages; bhritya, a servant,‡—are all cognate terms with the verb bharatum, to support, bear, maintain; and taking away their syllables of formation, the simple root bhri, bear, remains. The word allodium, whose origin has occasioned a multitude of conjectures, belongs to the same root as aldor and altor. It is first mentioned in the Salic Laws, where it appears in its true orthography, a German word with a Latin termination “de alod-is,”§ which by the canon of

* Horne Tooke, and the makers of etymological dictionaries, have the following unphilosophical and ludicrous derivation of ale, “A.-S. aloth, from ælan, to burn, inflame, because ale heats and inflames. Altoth is the third person of ælan.” Gentlemen who give instructions on the origin of words, a less easy matter than turning over the leaves of foreign dictionaries, ought to know that the third person of ælan is ælath. The word aloth or rather alodh is of more importance than they imagine.

† Professor Pott, it must be observed, refers alere, aljan, &c. to the Sanskrit root ridh, crescere, an l having taken place of the vowel ri.—Etymologische Forschungen, I. 150. In Rosen’s Radices Sanscritæ, “sufficere, valere” are among the significations of al, and alatum will, therefore, mean to do whatever contributes to increase the strength, and this I take to be the true sense of alere, &c.

‡ Col. Vans Kennedy, Researches into Origin of Lang. p. 193, 194. § Tit. 62.

transition answers to the Saxon alodh in its primary sense of aliment. In other antient laws and acts it is written alaud-is, alaud-um, alot-um, and alod-um,* constantly with a single liquid to the ninth century inclusive.† It corresponds in primary signification, as in etymology, to the Latin alit-ura, aliment; and everywhere in those antient monuments it denotes paternal or heritable land, that which constituted a man's livelihood, and which, being free from duty or service to a superior, was accurately opposed to feodum, or land lent to another to enjoy the profits as the wages of military service, performed and to be performed, so long as the land shall be held.‡ In the constitutions of the Duchy of Burgundy, the alod is called franc aloud, a free alimony whence came the other terms in French law, aloy, aleu, and aleuf, to signify what we improperly call allodium and allodial lands. Some variation in its import must have occasioned the addition of franc, for we find in our Domesday Book alodium used for a manor, and alodarii for lords paramount, though manors were of the nature of feods and subject to military service.

11. The old German alod, A.-Sax. alodh, Frankish alaud, primarily signified the same as their Latin cognate, alit-ura, that is, aliment in general; and one is quite at a loss to account for the perversity of judgment, which, rejecting the authority of the oldest documents, adapts the orthography to a whimsical notion that the word is compounded of

* See the authorities in Du Cange under the word Allodium.

† Capit. Caroli Calvi. passim. Formulæ Bignonianæ secundum Legem Romanum, &c.

‡ Professor Pott derives allodium in the old manner from the adjective all and od, property, possessions.—Etymologische Forschungen, II. 346. It is strange he could not perceive that od is a grammatical termination, as A.-S. huntn-odh, fisc-odh, &c., answering to the Sanskrit ta, as chaur-ata, theft, &c. It expresses nature, quality, office, and the like, the first of which is its meaning in the Teutonic alod, applied to land that constitutes a provision for the family, and in the A.-S. correspondent alodh, a nutritive liquor.

CHAP.
II.

all, whole, and od, possession. Had the skilled in etymological conundrums contrived to derive their allodium from all, and lad, both Norse, for all land, or entire land, in the sense of an estate, they would have found countenance for the term in the practice of the Rajpoots of Mewar, where the feudal system has flourished in full vigour for innumerable centuries. There the feudal lord, called a “grasya t’hacoor,” possessor of a gras, a subsistence, literally and familiarly, a mouthful, is opposed by the bhoomia or allodial proprietor, from Hindu bhoom, land, (Sanskrit bhumi, which seems connected with bhundatum, to support). “Some of these allodial proprietors,” says Col. Tod, “yet possess entire villages, which are subject to the payment of a small quit rent. They also constitute a local militia to be called in by the governor of the district, but for which service they are entitled to rations or paiti (literally, a belly full). These, the allodial tenantry of our feudal system, formed a considerable body in many districts, armed with matchlock, sword and shield.”*

* Annals of Rajasthan, v. 1, p. 169.

CHAPTER III.

Chiefs, with Titles allusive to Food, and Land antiently granted for sustenance.

- 1.—Patriarchal nature of the original feodal system. 2.—The patres of the Romans were aldors or chiefs of tribes. 3.—Senators, not old men: derivation of father. 4.—Pater and father cognates; Senapati, a military commander. 5.—Senatus, the meeting of a Sena or army. 6.—Fadreins corresponds etymologically with paternus: patria with Sanskrit padram, client, one under protection. 7.—Romakas, an Asiatic people, allies of the Sakasenas. 8.—Chiefs regarded as providers. 9.—Servants regarded as persons maintained or nourished. 10.—The same notions (8 and 9) among the antient Sakasenas; paiti, a ration, the pay of a Soldier; a knight's meat-home, and a knight's feod or fee synonymous; Stiernhelm's identification of feodum with food, a sagacious discovery in his age. 11.—Födeby, in Danish, equivalent to meat-home: Food is the Sanskrit bhat. 12.—Absurd derivations of feodum. 13.—Fundus, land, that which nourishes; farm, the same meaning. 14.—Patres, their early duties. 15.—Wages in kind; wealth of pastoral chiefs. 16.—Plunder, the support of magnificence. 17.—Phrases indicative of equality between military chiefs and their followers.

1. Parallel to aldor in etymology and antient application to the leader of a tribe, is father, a word which obtains use in a greater number of languages. The frequent consecration of paternal appellations to chieftains, and the scriptural account of the Jews, have led many to believe that the earliest form of government, and that most generally adopted, was patriarchal. To discuss this subject is beside the present purpose, which has no relation to Shemitic institutions or titles. It is sufficient to find that the entire system of feod resembles the economy of a considerable household, and that many of the principal, the titles to which it has given birth, correspond with the circumstances of an

CHAP.
III.

PATER.
FATHER.

CHAP.
III.

establishment, consisting of kindred, friends and domestics. The patriarchal character of the feudal institutions of Western and Central Asia, is particularly remarked by Col. Tod, and abundant testimony of the same character in those of Europe, will be frequently noticed in the illustrations which it will be necessary to produce. That gentleman, who has most satisfactorily established a great similitude between the Asiatic and European systems, says,—“Whatever term may be applied to the institutions of a martial race, which, for the sake of being more readily understood, we have called, and shall continue to designate, ‘feodal,’ we have not a shadow of doubt that they were common to the Rajpoot races from the remotest ages, and that Séôji conveyed them from the seat of his ancestors, Canouj. A finer picture does not exist of the splendour of a feudal array than the camp of its last monarch, Jeichund, in the contest with the Chohan. The annals of each and every state bear evidence to a system strictly parallel to that of Europe, more especially Mewar, where, thirteen hundred years ago, we see the entire feudatories of the state throwing up their grants, giving their liege lord defiance, and threatening him with their vengeance; yet, having ‘eaten his salt,’ they forbore to proceed to hostilities till a whole year had elapsed, at the expiration of which they deposed him.*

“In contrasting these customs with analogous ones in the West, the reader should never lose one point, which must influence the analogy, viz: the patriarchal form which characterises the feudal system in all countries, and as amongst the Rajpoots, all their vassalage is often their own kin and blood (save a slight mixture of foreign nobles as a counterpoise), the paternity of the sovereign is no fiction as in Europe: so that from the son of Champa, who takes the right hand of his prince, to the meanest vassal, who serves merely for his paiti (rations), all are linked by the tie of consanguinity.”*

* About A. D. 135.

2. We are told that as soon as Rome was surrounded with a wall, a legislature was formed consisting of the king and the senate, the latter composed of the common people, and a council of one hundred of the principal citizens.† The members of this council were called Senators, and patres or fathers, and it is distinctly stated that Tullus, in order to augment this portion of the Republic, chose the Tullii, Servilii, Quintii, and several other princes of the Albani, to be fathers.‡ This proceeding was strictly analogous to the practice of the Germans, among whom, on great occasions, several independent aldors or princes united under a common leader, with whom they advised on the conduct to be pursued; but if Mr. Hallam’s caution§

* Annals, &c. II. p. 33, 34.

† Before this time the Etrurians occupied the greater part of Italy, and the Romans may possibly have been a colony of them. Etruria proper, was divided into twelve cantons, called Lucomones, which gave name to the magistrates, and were each governed by a magistrate called Lucomon. Chrisium, one of their cities, was anterior to the siege of Troy.—Journal Britanique, t. II. p. 366. Lucomon being manifestly the same as the Iceland name of a judge, lagaman, a man of law, must have given name to his jurisdiction. This word, and the name of the Tuscan oracular deity, Tagus, which Cicero says was found in ploughing up a field, are clearly, if not Teutonic, Indo-European, for tag is no other than dag, dæg, day, daylight, or the Sun, and so another name of the prophetic Apollo.

‡ “Principes Albanorum, ut ea quoque pars reipublicæ cresceret legit Tullios, Servilios, &c.”—Liv. I. 30.

§ “It is easy to find partial resemblances to the feudal system. The relation of patron and client in the Republic of Rome has been deemed to resemble it as well as the Barbarians and Veterans who held frontier lands on the tenure of defending them and the frontier; but they were bound not to an individual but to the state.”—Hist. of Middle Ages, I. 200. This reason is of very small value; for the principle of the tenure remains the same whether one or more persons claim the military service due for the land. According to this gentleman, the knights, who were tenants of monasteries and other corporations by the service of defending them, did not hold knight’s fees, nor were their lords feudal lords, and all the lawyers who were their contemporaries, and who practised under feudal laws, were against admitting the evidence of partial resemblance be observed, the meeting of the people, with their chiefs, in deliberation on the affairs of the Commonwealth, cannot be the same sort of thing on the Palatine and the Brocken. A like diet or parliament, however, is held at the present day in Asia, in those countries whence both Sakasens and Romans originally issued ; and whether so or not, it is not extraordinary to find people occupied about the same object, employing similar means of attainment. The Great Talk of the Red Men is as much a senate and a parliament as the first assemblies and the meetings of the Saxon aldoras and witan.

CHAP.
III.

3. Florus says—"The care of the state was in the hands of the old men, who, on account of their authority, were called patres, and on that of their age, Senatores:" so that the same notion prevailed among the more recent Romans, as among the English, respecting the aldormen. It is in cases of this kind that rational etymology is of signal utility. The older Romans could less afford to endure the encumbrance of old men than the Germans, if the accounts of their first settlement in Italy possess any shadow of a foundation in truth. The identity of the Sanskrit PITRI, Persic, pedar, Gr. & Lat. pater, Norse fader, A.-S. fæder, German vater, and English father, is universally acknowledged, and it is evident that the primary sense of one will answer for the rest. Professor Jäkel, seeking for the root in the Gothic dialects, supposes that it is contained in the verb fæda, to bring forth, to nourish ; but this verb is radically characterized by a different vowel, and is in fact a derivative of the Sanskrit bhat (pronounced vut), nourish,* wrong in calling the former "milites feoda tenentes," and lands "militum feoda." But it is the principle and not the incidents of the thing, that characterizes its nature.

* Dr. Webster produces "the Norman foder" to illustrate the derivation of father. This verb, he says, "signifies both to feed and to dig, uniting with feed, the Latin fodio." But if so, foder to feed, is a Northern word,

The Brahmans deduce pitri, a father, from pi or pa, both explained by the same word "pane," in drinking, sc. paniyam, water, the chief sustenance of animals and vegetables, or because liquid food is the first aliment given to young animals. Pana or paniya becomes the Latin panis, bread, a general term for aliment. The same idea, it has been seen, connects aldor and alodh. Pa also signifies preserve, cherish, nourish, and as the termination tri is equivalent to the Latin ter, pater, or pitri, a father, is one that nourishes and preserves by giving aliment.

Fadhar is said to be the Gothic form of father; but though it may certainly be inferred from brodhar, brother, it does not occur in the Gospel of Ulphilas; but fads or fadhs, which makes part of several compounds, as hunda-fadhs, a centurion, brudhfadhs, a bridegroom, seems to have occasioned the use of atta, a father, a cognate of the Sanskrit attum, to eat, in place of this very general appellation.

4. The Gothic monosyllable is the representative of the Sanskrit PATI, a master, lord, husband, which is formed from the same root as pitri. Fadhs, father, and pater are, therefore, cognates of pati. The first and last words are used precisely in the same manner and sense. Hunda-fadhs, a centurion, the leader of one hundred soldiers, the "hundredes ealdor," of the Anglo-Saxon Gospel, thusenda-fadhs, a chiliarch, the leader of a thousand, and brudh-fadhs, a bridegroom, the nourisher and protector of a woman. Among the Visigoths, fad, in composition with thiuda, people, nation, was latterly a prefect selected from the ministers of the palace, and decided particular causes as a judge.* Faad, faud, and fowde, was antiently and for a long time the title of the Danish governor of the Zet-

*Pater and Father
cognate.*

Fowde.

and totally unconnected with the Latin, while foder, to dig, is fodire, itself, and ought to be written fodir.

* Leges Wisigoth l. II. n. 15, tit. "Quales causas audire debeant thiufadi."

CHAP.
III.

Sena-pati.

Senatus,
the meeting of the Sena, or army
chiefs.

land Isles; and fowde occurs in the sense of a bailiff in the acts of James VI. of Scotland, in 1581, relating to the Orkney Islands.* The true signification of these terms will be seen from that of pati in conjunction with CHAMUH or SENA, an army. In Sanskrit, the general of an entire army is senapati, the lord, the nourisher, the maintainer of the army; and the general of a large division, was chamupati, the provider of the eaters, viz. the army. And it is not altogether unworthy of notice that formerly the king or leader of a gipsey tribe was commonly called Johnny Fad or Johnny Faw, an easy corruption, by auricular orthography, of either of the terms just mentioned.† This is only one out of many Sanskrit words in use among these singular vagrants, and may not be without application in their early history.

5. Neither pati nor fad was inseparable from the word which it terminated; pati is a lord, as fad is a governor when disjoined from thiude, the people. The Roman pater, in the sense of a senator and magistrate, resembles this pati disjoined from sena, an army. When Romulus formed a single band of several companies, consisting nominally of one hundred men, each under its own chief, now called a centurion, he did no more than continue in the new town what had always existed among the Asiatics, who settled in Europe, some to the north and others to the south of the Danube.

* The old Swedish fogde, more antiently fogat, fogati, fougte, German vogd, vogt, the governor of a district, city, or castle, are not as Dr. Jamieson seems to suppose, cognates of fad. They are referable to the title fawjdar, an officer of police in Hindustan, and chief magistrate of a chaklah, who takes cognizance of criminal matters. This title is formed from fawj, a body of men, a troop, squadron, an army, which is connected with fu, a mouth; fawgh, thickness of mouth, &c.; and fawjdar, or as the Hindus call it, foujdar, is chief of the mouths or eaters, which is not a solitary instance of an appellation given to a body of soldiers who literally devour their rations, and, in Eastern style, their enemies.

† Locke found Peter Gower in a book of freemasonry, for Pythagore, a French orthography of Pythagoras.

The fad, the pati, and the aldor equally consulted his followers on affairs of importance ; in time of war the aldoras and other chiefs elected a superior, who like Romulus presided over the assemblies of the hundreds with their several commanders ; and that these commanders were not strangers to their bands is established beyond controversy among the Germans and the modern Asiatics, who only adhere to the customs of their ancestors. This deliberative assembly was with the Romans, a meeting of the sena and its patres ; among the Germans it was a diet, significant of its popular construction, from Goth. thiuda, the people or nation. This seems to be the origin of the Roman senate. From the same word sena, an army, came the Longobardic zana, an armed or tumultuary assembly,* the old German sen, a multitude or concourse of people, and not improbably the old French senne, a synod, which has been considered to be a derivative of the Latin signum, used in the middle ages to denote a bell, or the ringing of a bell.† Passing over the resemblance of the Greek synod-os to the Latin senat-us, in its material and radical letters, two proper names among the Romans, Senecio and Seneca, it may be observed are pure Sanskrit ; sainika, one connected with the army, as, a sentinel.

6. The Gothic fadreins, a family, corresponds etymologically with the Latin paternus, of a father ; and hence results another agreement between the title pater and that of aldor. The Latin patria (Sanskrit padram, a village), concurs in a restricted sense of fatherland with aldea, a village ; and pater, like aldor, the Goth. fad, Danish faad,

Fadreins
and Paternus.

* "Cognovimus quod per singulas civitates mali homines, zanas, id est, adunationes contra judicem suum agentes faciunt."—Lex Longob. l. II. tit. 18, n. 2.

† It occurs in the synodal statutes of the archbishop of Tours, in 1396, quoted by Du Cange : "Comme le senne soit establi à la correction des crimes et reformation des mœurs, que les abbes, recteurs, et chappelains entrent le senne à la premiere pulsation d'iceluy." The senne to correct crimes and reform manners, cannot be the senne to call its members together.

CHAP.
III.

and Gipseý faa or pati, was the chief, the magistrate, protector and cherisher of his people.* Patron is radically the same word, but more particularly than pater, denotes a weathy protector (PATRAH in Sanskrit). His client is a follower dependent upon him for protection. The relation between the two, in the first days of Rome, was no doubt the very same as that between lord and vassal, the protector and protected, in the northern feudal system. Cliens, in Latin, is a cognate of the A.-S. hleon-ian, to lean against, Goth. hlaine, a hill, a declivity, that which inclines; perhaps the Sanskrit lina, in contact with, from li, to embrace.

Early Romans and their Patria.

7. When the Romans, who seem to have been a section of the Romaikas, or men dressed in hair cloth, mentioned in the Puranas as the allies of the Sakas and Sakasenas, settled in Latium, they founded their padram or village† at the foot of the Palatine Hill. The same term denoted their home when their territory extended from the Alps to the Mediterranean; and thus patria came to signify country in its greatest latitude. Its primary signification is place of sustenance and livelihood, the residence of the pati or pitri, the provider.

Chiefs
regarded as providers.

8. The primary notion entertained of a chief, that he was the provider of the food consumed by his people, is found in many appellations. Among the Saxons, for instance, the hlaforð, a lord, the source or origin of bread,‡ had a corres-

* "Pater Patriæ," the preserver of his country, was applied to Cicero, and is constantly used in this sense upon coins.

† The Sanskrit grammarians, adhering to letters rather than to connected ideas, derive padram from pad, go; but it is manifestly the place of the pitri or pati.

‡ Horne Tooke says that hlaforð is composed of the past tense of hlifian, to raise! and that ord (ortus) is source, origin; and "Lord, therefore, means high-born, or of an exalted origin."—Div. Purley, II. 157, 8. Hlaf can no more be the past tense of hlifian than aloth the present tense of ælan:

Sele hlifade

heah and horngeap.

The hall arose

high and pinnacled.

Beow. 163.

pondent hlaf æta, bread eater, a domestic servant, who was also his fedesl, or one whom he fed.* Such too were old German brotessen and brotlinge, bread eaters, domestics who ate their masters bread. These antient appellations are still in use in Germany, where brödlinge corresponds with hlafætan, bread eaters, and brotherr, bread-lord, answers to hlaford. The popular notion of servants is seen in the vulgar appellation of Beef-eaters, applied to the yeomen of the guard, which Sir Francis Palgrave has very ingeniously shown to be a corruption of Bæufetiers, a word formed from langue de bœuf, the old name of their halbert, from its resemblance to an ox tongue.

9. Fedestl, one that receives food for wages, appears to have been formed on the same principle as the Norse veitsla, a feast given, from the verb veita, to offer; but this word, which is also written veisla and veizla, in old Swedish wædsla, denoted not only a donative feast, but the present made by the entertainer to his guests, at the three terms into which the Gothic nations divided the year,† and particularly at the term or festival of yule.‡ Hence it became the appellation of such gifts, and gifts in lieu of the feasts to the household and tenantry. From this use it was accepted for the land held of a superior, instead of the pay in rations, which long anterior to the time of Tacitus, and

Beef-eaters

Servants regarded as persons maintained or nourished.

Dr. Jamieson, after Verelius, suggests the Icelandic lavardur, a landwarder; but the Saxons had this very word:

Landweard onfand

eft sidh eorla

swa he ær dyd.

The landwarder descried

the return of the warriors, as he ere did.

Ib. 3775.

The omission of the n is an Icelandic peculiarity.

* Laws of Ethelbert, c. 25.

† Tacit. de Mor. Germ.

‡ Sturlaugs Saga, c. 21. The yule feast, it need not be said, was a festival in honor of the Sun, and was so called from the Sanskrit jwala, a flame. The absurdity of derivations founded upon the external appearance of words could not be more strongly exemplified than in referring the name of this Gothic and Hindu festival to the Hebrew ללך, to turn or roll. See Mr. Rowcroft's, Hood's Mag. for 1845, art. English Etymologies.

CHAP.
III.*Veisluman.Vassal.The same notions
among the Sakasenas.Paiti, a rationFeodum.*

until the substitution of money or other representative of value, had been the stipend of servants and military followers ; and lastly, it signified the rent or military duty which constituted the tenure of the land.* He that partook of the feast, or received the vicarial present, or held the tributary land, was denominated a veisluman, whence according to Verelius, Loccenius, Biörner, and other learned northmen, the feudal term vasal or vassal (vasallus), was derived. The etymon is much more plausible than the direct derivation from the Keltic gwas, a servant, on the supposition that it is a diminutive of vasus, but as vasallus never did signify a servant, and as veisluman does not correspond with the sense of vasallus in the feudal law, neither deserves the favour which each has received.†

10. We see a like principle of nomenclature among the Sakasenas of India, who called a groom, bhogika, the eater, from bhoga, eating, and a servant or slave bhujishya, also an eater of his master's bread, from bhuj, eat. In like manner from bhat, to nourish, maintain, hire, come bhati, wages, hire, fee, literally sustenance, and bhatah, a soldier who takes bhati for his services. The principle is equally obvious in the Rajpoot title of the feudal lord of the present day, mentioned by Col. Tod, gras t'hacoor, where gras is literally a mouthful,‡ and the whole term is the consumer of a mouthful. So also paiti, the pay or ration of a soldier, we learn from the same authority, is a bellyful.§ And it is a remarkable coincidence with veisla, in the sense of land held for sustenance, that about two centuries after the first appearance of the barbarous Latin feodum, a feod, fief or fee, in exactly the same sense, the term "militis feodum," a knight's fee, is translated a knight's meat-home,

* Loccen. Gloss. Su. Go. in v. Wædsla.

† See Titles of Associates.

‡ Suprà, p. 36.

§ Buccellarius, in the middle ages, was a soldier, and also a feodatory or client, and took this name from boukellos, a little cake in the first instance, but afterwards a ration of food in payment of service in the field.

the land, place, or home of his meat and livelihood. This appears strongly in favour of Stiernhelm's discovery, sagacious for his time, that feodum was no other than the Teutonic föde, foda, food; for it can scarcely be doubted that the word was perfectly understood in the eleventh century, to which the corresponding Anglo-Saxon metehom belongs. It occurs in a vernacular enumeration of military fiefs belonging to the monastery of Shaftesbury, but though placed among some Latin charters of king Alfred, the language points to a period shortly after the conquest for that of its composition. The document, which has been miserably obscured by the transcriber, and suffered to pass uncorrected by the editors of the splendid Monasticum Anglicanum,* is valuable as a record of some of our old feudal terms; and on this account alone it merits further notice. Its title is explanatory of the service due from the tenants—"These are the lands of the knights that are bound to go into expedition (sceolon into fyrde faran) with the king, with their horse and gear for the church of Shaftesbury." The list contains seventeen places, beginning with Chicklade, each of which is said to be one whole knight's meat-home: then follow some parts of knight's fees, and an enumeration of six places consisting in all of six hides and three yards of land, which, it is observed, make one whole knight's meat-home, thus affording another proof of the variable quantity of land required to constitute a knight's fee. By the Mercian law five hides were to be possessed by a churl or husbandman before he could be admitted to thane right,† which it would appear was a rank below that of a middle thane. It is remarkable that the very same term for a quantity of land in the possession of a feudal vassal obtains in Rajasthan, where a hide of land is denominated a chursa, or skin, and consists of as much as one man can water.‡

* Vol. II. p. 447. † Laws of Edw. and Guthrum, Mercna L. c. 3.

‡ Col. Tod, Annals of Rajasthan, I, p. 131. This must also have been the reason of applying the term hide to a quantity of land. Antiently all liquids were contained in skins or leather bags.—See BUTLER, infra.

CHAP.
III.

The document concludes thus—"And all these knights that these lands possess do acknowledgment of the dominion of the monks of Shaftesbury and the minister." "Don manrædenne anwalds" might be rendered do homage of power or superiority; for manræd occurs in the Metegavel. sense of homage in the Saxon Chronicle.* Metegavel is another antient term like metehom, which Jacob explains to be rent paid by tenants in victuals to their lord; but which, by the construction of the words, appears to be rent paid for the meat or tenement.

Föde by.

11. The Danish föde by, applied to native country, has exactly the same meaning as metehom, the place of one's food or livelihood, which, as before remarked, is that of the Latin patria. This or the corresponding German term must have suggested the feodum, which appears, says Du Cange, for the first time in a decree of Charles the Fat, in 884, that such as did not accompany their lord in the expedition then undertaking, with military gear, should be deprived of their feod without hope of recovery.† One

* Knyst appears for Knygt, except in one place; maurdene, which is unintelligible for manredene, and an wallez, equally obscure, for anwalds, which was perhaps an waldez in the transcript of the original roll:—

"Thes beth thare knygtene londes that sillen into uverde uare myd the kyng myd hire hors, myd hyre ygare for thare cherche of Shaftesburye.

That arest lond hatte Chiklad and ys on yhol knygtesmetehom.

Two hyde of londe bes at Preston	}	And all thus makiat anne yholne Knygtesmetehom.
On hyde of londe ys at Bedeshurston
On hyde of londe ys at Iwerne
On hyde of londe ys at Haregrave
On hyde of londe ys at Pimperne
And thre gerde of londe bes at Kyngestone.

And alle thes knygtes that thes londes waldez doz manredene anwalds of than munechene of Syftebury and of than menstre.

† Cuicumque secundum hanc legem expeditio imperetur, si ad Curiam Gallorum, h. e. in campum, qui vulgo Rungalle dicitur, dominum suum non comitetur, et ibi cum militari apparatu non repræsentatur, FEODO, præter hos qui cum gratia dominorum suorum remanserunt in conspectu nostro, absque spe recuperationis privetur.—Constit. Car. Crassi, sub anno 884, apud Freker.

sees in this word an attempt to preserve the sound of the original diphthong which represents the short a in the Sanskrit root bhat (pronounced vut, where by Grimm's canon, $V=F$ and $T=D$), to nourish, feed. Thus we see that feodum, improperly written feudum, is primarily food, secondarily wages (bhati, and now batta), and lastly, land granted in payment of service in the field.

12. In all this there is a consistent similitude to a household; the pater familias or husband is the chief, bound to provide the sustenance of his domestics as the return for their services. The same term for land, considered as a substitute of food, appears equally in India, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, England, and Franconia. It is, however, sometimes useful to examine different etymologies, as in the case of Aldor and Aldorman, in order to contrast the laboured and compounded with the obvious and natural. Some writers delight in looking upon antient terms in the light of conundrums, and others in hunting after lurking places that surprise when discovered. Thus Sir Henry Spelman derives feodum from "A.-S. feh, feo, feoh," salary, stipend, wages, and "hade, head, hood," quality, kind, nature; by contraction, feud or feod, that is, in a stipendiary way, with the acknowledgment of a superior, and a condition of returning service for it. On this very unlikely derivation Sir Martin Wright bestows his approbation, for, says he "it not only suggests the most probable account of the word, but gives us the clearest description of the thing itself."* The etymology, however, is an

*Absurd
derivations of feodum.*

* Law of Tenures, p. 4. Shakspeare's derivation of woman from tender air is a counterpart of feoh and had contracted into feodum:

The piece of tender air, thy virtuous daughter,
Which we call mollis aer; and mollis aer
We term it mulier.

Cymbeline V. sc. last.

Etymologically, and partly in sense, feodum and bhati are the same word. In the present dialect of Mewar, the latter is paiti, while the land, held under a grant by military service, is called putta. In a remonstrance of adaptation of two foreign words to the definition of the thing, and is vitiated by the extinction of the aspirated initial of the word, supposed to qualify the principal term. If had had been employed, it could not have suffered mutilation; but besides this objection, the process imagined never takes place. Sir Francis Palgrave suggests the Greek emphytensis, a precaria, as the etymon of feudum. "A precaria," he says, "was a benefice, a benefice was a feudum, or rather fevdum, and no better etymology can be found for this last term, than by supposing it to be a colloquial abbreviation of emphytensis."* Others derive it from odh, possession in the northern languages, and fee, stipendiary, which, they say, producing feodh or feudum, will denote stipendiary property.† Sir Francis Palgrave, rejecting this process, as well as the direct derivation from faida, a quarrel, suggested by Pontanus and others, remarks that "upon all the Teutonic etymologies, it is sufficient to observe that the theories are contradicted by the practice the vassals or feodatories of Mewar against their chief, bhatta denotes a ration.—Annals of Rajasthan, I. Append. No. II. p. 198. This word Bhata in Hindustani, is additional pay or field allowance, from bhat, boiled rice. In Bengali, it becomes batta, and forms an important feature in the emoluments of a military officer. The following is a statement of the pay and allowances of a commandant of artillery in the Bengal Service, now deceased:

CHAP.
III.

" His pay was.....				304	6	rupees per month.
Batta		760	15	"	"
Horse allowance..	30	—	"	"	"
Tent	"	.. 200	—	"	"
Staff	"	.. 1600	—	"	"

2895 5 rupees per month."

One wonders to see a philologist like Professor Pott adopting the bungling derivations of the old lawyers and etymologists. "Feodum, feudum könnte etwa in fidem data, possessio (Alts. ôd, noch in klein-od) sein, da Alt-Franz. fe, Lat. fides, verkommt, &c."—Etymologische Forschungen, II. 346. By what process the old Saxon od and the old French fe came together, he does not explain, and as to od in kleinod, it is the grammatical termination found in alod, and other words of similar formation.

* Engl. Commonw. II, p. 206.

† Blackstone, Comm. II, p. 45.

of the Teutonic tongues—a feud or fief is not called by such a name or by any name approaching thereto in any Teutonic or Gothic language whatever. Lehn is the only corresponding term.” Feud as well as fie occurs in Norman French, but most probably from the Latin feodum, already noticed as employed by Charles the Fat, and fed or “fedium” is found in a charter of Philip II. of France in 1090. It is true that we do not meet with feod in German in the sense of land, but we have föde by in Danish, just noticed; and it may also be said that no equivalent of lehn is found in Latin. The argument used by Sir Francis proves nothing, or too much; for if it is valid in one case it is in another; and because in the Gothic or Teutonic languages a feudal lord is never called a baron, we ought to conclude that this term is not of the Gothic or Teutonic family, the very supposition of which would be absurd. As to lehn in Germ., lön in Swedish and Danish, and len in Icelandic, a feod, they are all equivalent to the English loan, and denote rather the condition of the feod than the feod itself, which in Icelandic was veitsla, and in Swedish wædsla, a feast. Lehn.

13. The Latin term for land, ground, fundus, answers to the Persian bund, an estate, and English bound, primarily a territory and then its limits, and affords another illustration of wædsla and föde for land. Fundus and its cognates are derived from the Sanskrit BHUNDATUM, to nourish (root BHUD). The same idea of a parcel of ground appropriated to the purposes of subsistence, is equally visible in the Anglo-Saxon feorme, which is both food and a farm.* It appears to be one of the innumerable terms in the Indo-European dialects that are ultimately referable to the Sanskrit bhri, bear, (bharami) bhartum, to support, maintain, nourish. Fundus, what nourishes or supports.

14. Among the Romans, Patres, in consequence of the mystic import attached to the word, as well as its reference Early duties of the Patres.

* Lices feorme, a corpse-feast, in Beowulf, 892.

CHAP.
III.

to the original power of the heads of the tribes so called, was an honorary title conferred upon magistrates and senators;* but the corresponding term among the Germans was confined to private persons, while their chiefs were denominated by a term significant of the obligation upon a prince to make a fatherly provision for his people. And in very small tribes, such as the Helviconæ for instance, this obligation would be something more than a grammatical figure of speech, for it would be his business to attend to the selection of the best pasture and hunting grounds. Where several such tribes united to form a nation, the aldoras and altherrin assisted at their councils, and administered justice among their own people. They were aldoras who conducted the first bands of Saxons into Britain, and what the Saxon translator of the Gospel calls the "hundredes ealdor," the chief of a hundred, the Gothic translator terms "hunda fads," or fadhs, the maintainer of a hundred, or pater patriæ, in a limited sense of country, corresponding with the Visigothic thiufad, which, though a prefect or chief magistrate in Spain, could not have been originally otherwise than a leader of the people. Everywhere these maintaining chiefs are mentioned by Tacitus under the term principes, and from his account they seem to have been in the condition of the nomadic chiefs to whom the title was first applied.†

Wages in food and lodging.

15. According to Tacitus, the aldoras maintained large bands of personal attendants, who constituted their power,

* In Oriental mythology the pitris (fathers) are a race of divine beings, sprung from the side of Brahma, and inhabiting celestial regions of their own. They receive into their society the spirits of those mortals for whom the rite of fellowship in obsequial cakes (the sapindikarana) has been duly performed. The pitris, therefore, collectively include a man's ancestors; but the principal members of this order of divine beings are of a different origin. The Pitriyajna were libations to the manes.—See Wilson's Vishnu Purāna p. 123, n. 25; p. 322, n; p. 294, n. 3.

† According to Livy the "principes" of the Albans were made "patres" of Rome at an early period.—Suprà, p. 39, n. †.

their glory, and their magnificence, and to whom they gave in recompence of their services, meat and drink, with large though rude entertainment which answered in the stead of a stipend.* This description is only a long definition of what an English rustic called wages in board and lodging, and of which the memory exists in some old Law terms, such as drinclean, potura, meaning like the Sanskrit pana, wages, a compensation in drink, which seems in antient times to have comprehended more substantial aliment than the liquid. Research for the purpose would probably detect many terms significant of the custom of paying servants and others their wages in board and lodging, before money was substituted. The chiefs of the Germans, however, had no alternative; money and the use of money were equally unknown, so that wages and military stipend alike consisted in the necessaries of life; and the possession of a sufficiency, and a surplus of the staple food of man, constituted a man rich or poor. There is a striking proof of this in Sanskrit. The name for wealth, dhan, when a verbal root, denotes, to produce rice; and a country devoid of water was stigmatized as dhanwan, poor, or wanting dhanya, rice, the staple food of the Eastern nations, which is produced under water or in marshy ground. The greater the quantity of rice a chief was enabled to distribute, the more numerous was his band, thence termed chamuh, the eater, and consequently the more extensive his real power and magnificence became. Substitute flocks and herds for rice, and the same result follows: the oldest description of an antient chief, among the people of the East, is that of Job, whose “substance was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the East.”

* Tacit. c. 14.

CHAP.
III.

Plunder the source of magnificence.

16. In Europe, princely splendour and greatness were measured among the Gothic tribes, not by extent of territory, for that belonged to the nation, but by the multitude of the population; and among the Germans it was the pride and glory of an aldor to be attended by a number of youths in the quality of companions. The funds of this magnificence, says Tacitus, were to be attained by war and rapine.* This band was formed from the sons of the chief and his nearest kinsmen, hence epithets of honor or endearment are frequently founded upon the relationship subsisting between him and his immediate attendants: and magaczogo, literally the duke or leader of his relations, borrowed from this feudal usage, is applied by a German poet of the ninth century to the deity himself, as the protector of the Emperor Louis or Ludwig in his youth.†

" Kind wart er vatterlos	A child he became fatherless,
Dess warth ihm sehr bos	Which was to him a great affliction ;
Holoda nan ‡ truhtin,	The Lord received the chief,
Magaczogo warth her sin."	And became his guardian.

Epinic. Regis Ludw. 2.

Success in war and pillage had the same effect as riches in flocks and herds ; " the household became very great : "

Tha wæs Hrodhgare	Then was given to Roger here sped gyfen	success in arms,
wiges weorthmynd	the dignity of war,
thæt to him his wine magas	so that his dear relations
georne hyrdon	gladly obeyed him,
odhhdh thæt seo geogoth geweax	until the youths grew up
mago driht micel.	a mighty kindred band.

Beow. 127.

Companionship of chiefs

17. All business of a servile nature was committed to the lassi, whose appellation (from Sanskrit las or lash) denotes handicrafts men, or to slaves, whose appellation in the

* "Materia munificentiae per bella et raptus."—De Mor. Ger. c. 14.

† See p. 38.

‡ So in Langbecke, who copies Schilter; but should we not read nam?

Germanic dialects is universally synonymous with thief,* as if they thought none but the lowest of the people would work or steal. On the contrary, a freeman was noble by birth, and to such no term in the slightest degree indicative of servitude could ever attach without ignominy. For the discharge of military duties, they had no phrases like ours significant of servitude and obedience to the will of a master; they merely "went with the army," or "on an expedition,"† and then never as the general's servant, but his gisellon, companions, or vassals.‡ With them all military employment was military companionship, and when they acknowledged the superior to whom they were indebted for their paiti, pay, their bellyful or rations of food, or feods in lieu of that stipend, they proudly styled themselves his men, even when in after times Latin was employed as the medium of homage. This very term homage evinces the absurdity of imagining that they borrowed the foreign appellation of a servant in order to degrade themselves by a voluntary assumption of a disgraceful term to be applied to the whole body of military companions. Vassalage never implied service until different habits of life, and a debasing adulation of wealth and power, rendered them convertible terms.§ Even the Anglo-Saxons under the

* In Goth. thiubs, A.-S. theof, thiof, O.H.G. thiob, diub, a thief; and in Goth. thiwe, A.-S. theow, Iceland. thiw, a slave. Of these the root is really the same; for between the Sanskrit dhiv, move, which gives the latter meaning one that obeys, and dhav, move swiftly, which gives thief, the difference, which consists in the vowels, corresponds with that of the derivatives. The long ā becomes ee, and the short i, iu, just as the root shiv, sew, produces Lat. suere, Goth. siujan, A.-S. seowian, Engl. to sew.

† A.-S. herefyrd and herefær, O. Germ. heriuart, the going of the army, an expedition. O. Norse heria, A.-S. herian, to hary, plunder, act like or with the army; but in modern phrase, to serve.

‡ "Troestet hiu gesellion Mine notstallon."

Epinic. R. Lud. st. 15.

Be of good cheer,
My vassals and officers.

§ The Keltic gwas, a servant, is very commonly considered to be the

CHAP.
III.

Norman expressed the feudal phrase "do homage and service," by "do homage of chieftancy," we have seen in the Shaftesbury roll of knights fees.*

etymon of vasus, which is supposed to be the original of vassal. But the vassi were not servants; they were great officers of the household, as appears throughout the capitularies of Charles the Bald; and in the Salic Law "Si quis vasum ad ministerium," &c. refers to the vasus in a ministerial and not a servile capacity.—Tit. 34. The Franks, who did not understand Keltic, were content with the words which had come with them from the east, where vasa denoted a house, a dwelling. "In Mewar, the prince's architect, painter, physician, bard, genealogist, heralds, and all the generation of foster brothers, held lands. Offices are hereditary in this patriarchal government; their services are personal. All the higher offices—cup bearer, butler, stewards of the household, wardrobe, kitchen, master of the horse, are enumerated as ministerialists (muntera, mystification) at the Court of Charlemagne, in the dark ages of Europe. These are what the author of the Middle Ages designates as improper feuds."—Annals Rajasthan, I, p. 140. The Keltic gwas is merely a cognate of this vasus, a domestic officer.

* P. 48, n. *. Don manrædenne anwalds. The word is a compound of man, a man, and ræden, (f. gend.) a law, control, statute, condition, decree, &c.

CHAPTER IV.

The Feodal System primitive and universal.

- 1.—Property in the soil not originally vested in an individual. 2.—Feods known earlier than is assigned to them. 3.—Land shared by conquerors: 4.—Down to the 10th century. 5.—Sole property of land vested in the sovereign, a legal fiction. 6.—Wherever the chief characters of feudalism are found, the feudalism exists. 7.—Not original among the Germans. 8.—Known to the Asiatics before the departure of the Sakas to Europe. 9.—Count de Boulainvilliers' opinion of historical errors in regarding Gaul as the patrimony of the Merovingian princes. 10.—The growth of monarchical power. 11.—Condition of petty sovereigns. 12.—Hallam supposes the Scandinavians to have been ignorant of feudalism. 13.—The system existing in central Asia. 14.—Pinkerton on its universality in the earliest ages; supported by St. Martin and Richardson. 15.—Patton, on its origin among pastoral nations. 16.—Tod, on the martial system of Rajasthan. 17.—Turkish timar; Mewar putta; Persian jagir; fiefs of land held by military service. 18.—Feodal system found in Africa: 19.—Among the Caucasian mountains: 20.—In Livonia: 21.—In antient Britain: 22.—Probably not everywhere the same in all respects, and yet sufficiently similar to be identical. 23.—Beneficium and munus merely translations of Teutonic words. 24.—Ascribed to the comparatively recent decrees of Roman emperors. 25.—Early migration of the German tribes. 26.—Offer of the Cimbri and Teutons to become vassals to Rome. 27.—Romans recovered their knowledge of civil liberty from their observation of it among the barbarians: 28.—Whom they began to imitate; comites copied from the gesidhas, or companions; Sanskrit etymology of the latter title. 29.—The Saxon gesidh, a nobleman, and the Sanskrit sithi, a disciple, their radical signification. 30.—Knight considered as a companion of the prince. 31.—Roman imperial comites and amici. 32 and 33.—Examples of Roman imitation. 34.—Selden and Palgrave on the origin of feods. 35.—Reasons why the German conquerors could not adopt Roman laws and customs.

1. "THE grand and fundamental maxim of all the feodal tenure is this," says Judge Blackstone, "that all lands

CHAP.
IV.

CHAP.
IV.

were originally granted out by the sovereign, and are therefore holden, either mediately or immediately, of the crown.”* If such were the fundamental maxim, it will necessarily follow that there could be no feods where there was not a sovereign, by which Mr. Hallam understands a man, not the state; for, objecting to what he calls seeming analogies in the customs of various countries, he says, “the relation of patron and client in the republic of Rome has been deemed to resemble it, as well as the barbarians and veterans who held frontier on the tenure of defending them and the frontier; but they were bound not to an individual, but to the state.”†

*Feods,
their high antiquity.*

2. On this interpretation of the feudal system, which is contrary to that which naturally results from the etymology of feod, as well as to the terms employed in the feudal law, it will be impossible to consider the tenure of lands on the condition of military service as belonging to it, in any country where the property in the soil is not actually, or by fiction, vested in an individual. The constitution of feods is traced to the military policy of Germanic nations, and yet the land was the common property; and the Cimbri and Teutons, who about two centuries before the Christian era, proposed to hold military fiefs under the Roman senate, most assuredly did not think that fiefs or feods must necessarily be granted by an individual.

*Land
shared by its conquerors.*

3. Among the Northern nations, whatever was acquired in war, was shared by lot among the participators in the dangers of the conquest. They applied the same principle to land, and their king, who as we have seen, was no more than one of the confederate chiefs, elected to conduct the enterprise, was subject to the chance of the lot with the lowest of the army. This is remarkably illustrated by the French historians, who relate that Chlodovœus, otherwise Ludwig, in 486, having taken Rheims, plundered the church of its plate. The archbishop requested him to restore a silver chalice, which he promised. Calling a council of the barons and principal knights, he named his desire to comply with the archbishop's entreaty. They were willing to surrender not only the chalice, but their individual shares entirely to his pleasure;* when a Frank stepping forward, cut the chalice in two with his sword, saying, Sir, you shall have nothing here but that share which may be assigned you by a fair lot.† All claimed a proportionable allotment in the spoil whether it were money or land, and to suppose otherwise, we must believe that the free warriors of the north left their native land in order to conquer solely for the advantage of their leaders, who were such only by their own votes, and consequently before the election, no more than themselves, that is, chiefs of equal power, according to the expression of Beda. They were, in fact, partners in the expedition, taking shares in proportion to the aid which they rendered in men and horse.

* Comm. II, p. 53.

† Middle Ages, I, p. 200.

4. Thus, then, in the fifth century there was no appearance of the feudal system, if it be essential to it, that the land should belong or be imagined to belong to an individual. Just as little appearance of it is discernible in the beginning of the tenth century, when the Norman Rollo divided the territory of Neustria, conquered from France, by ad-measurement among his followers.‡ Yet during all this

To the 10th Century.

A. D. 912.

* Sane ex his spoliis non partem, sed totum tuæ potestati cedimus: ut volueris fac: aut mergi fluminibus, vel flammis jubeas tradi voracibus, nil ad nos attinet: tantum ut tuo satisfiat desiderio.—Aimoin, l. I, c. 12.

This speech is differently reported in the Croniques de St. Denis. “Nous n'avons nul droit en toutes ces despoilles, à nous n'en appartient de riens, ta volonté en puet faire tout plainnement ou de geter ès fleuves ou ardoir en feu.”—c. 15. It is not very probable that the barons would declare that they had no right in the spoils, since they insisted afterwards upon the partition of the territory, to which they would be equally unentitled.

† Tu rex hinc nihil accipies, nisi quod tibi vera sors auferre permiserit.

“Tu n'enporteras de ces despoilles fors ce que tu en emporteras par droit sort, et par droite parcon.”

‡ Verbis cœpit adquisitam terram metiri, comitibusque suis et cæteris fidelibus suis largiri.—Will. Gemet. l. II, c. 19.

CHAP.
IV.

time, from the Cimbric and Teutonic wars, this people held land as fiefs subject to military service with some of its chief incidents.

Individual proprietary vested in the sovereign, a legal fiction.

5. Upon the principle that to constitute a military feod, it should be granted by an individual, as the sole proprietor of native and conquered territory, we are to date the rise of the system from the time when this absurdity,—absurd because impossible among the Germanic nations,—was first adopted as a legal fiction. And this will be somewhere about the time when the alodarii surrendered their paternal domains into the hands of the emperor in order that they might be returned to them as fiefs, by which the lords, before considered as inferior to the military chiefs, would be raised to an equality with them. In all probability, the leader of an expedition, obtaining a larger allotment than his followers, was enabled to support a greater state and exercise a greater power. Of this allotment he granted fiefs to his immediate officers and favourites, and as these were indulged with privileges incidental to their offices and station about the leader or prince, the other leaders would become emulous of their advantages. In process of time, the maxim of the feudalists, diametrically the reverse of the fundamental maxim which governed the title to land, became established, and a military feod could not exist without an individual grantor. It is only on some supposition of this kind, we may believe with Sir Francis Palgrave, the first chapter of feodality to be found in the Roman law and the imperial rescripts.*

Where the chief characters of feodalism are, there is feodalism.

6. According to this deduction, all those remarkable features of feudalism which characterized the polity of the Germanic nations before the ninth century or thereabouts, have no relation to feudalism, because lands were held of the state and not of an individual. They are resemblances or analogies which cannot be safely admitted without destroying the maxim which the feodalists are pleased to call fundamental. We must accept a mere fiction as the basis of a system which existed anterior to it, and which extensively prevails among people who never yet dreamed of surrendering a portion of their right in the soil into a power of their own making. This is to circumscribe the term of feudalism within a very brief space of time, and to reject the most obvious characters on which the proof of identity depends. A cherry, if it be white in one place, black in another, and red in a third, is to be considered a different fruit, although it might be pretended that these are only accidental properties resulting from a difference in soil, climate, or culture; and a fish taken from the water ceases to be a fish when salted; for such is the effect of the argument which makes the sovereign an essential ingredient in the original constitution of a military fief.

* Hist. of Engl. Constit. I, p. 76, 77.

Apparently, Mr. Hallam and Sir Francis Palgrave do not allow the existence of a system of military feods, unless it present all the features which are observed in the last books of the feodalists, and which were added under different changes of society and variations of policy. Thus, if they found in one country that a vassal could not give or sell his land without the consent of his lord,* nor alienate ascertained services,† the land would not be considered a military fee, because the tenant was not also prohibited from selling his male beasts,‡ or marrying his daughter,§ or making his son a priest, without the same consent.|| These were five principles in the Longobardic system, and they were extended to this country under the Normans. The two first were common to all, and, being founded in reason and justice, were not prejudicial to liberty; but the Antient incidents of feudalism.

Recent incidents.

* "Possunt dare vel vendere, sed ad voluntatem domini."

† "Non alienare certa 'servitia.'"

‡ "Averium masculum non vendere."

§ "Filiam non maritare, nisi det domino merchetam."

|| "Filiū omnino non facere clericum."—Spelm. Gloss. v. Sokemanria (Libera). See Soc, socman, infra.

CHAP.
IV.Feodalism not original among the Germans.

others are additions and unessential to the system, which might and did exist for centuries without them.

7. It is thought generally enough, says M. St. Martin in his dissertation on the origin and history of the Arascides, that this kind of government, which prevailed some centuries ago, and which is called the feudal system, was peculiar to Europe, and that it is in the forests of Germany we must look for its origin. If, however, instead of admitting facts without discussing them, as too often happens, we examine this opinion a little, it will disappear before criticism, or at least become singularly modified, and we shall find that if it is in the German forests we have derived the feudal system, it certainly is not original there. If we would compare Europe, such as it was in the twelfth century, with the monarchy founded in Asia by the Arascides three centuries before our era, we shall see everywhere the like institutions and usages. We shall find there the same dignities and even the same titles. To drink, to hunt, to fight, to make and unmake kings were the noble occupations of a Parthian.*

*Is an Asiatic
institution.*

8. The same idea by which service is considered to be purchased by food and maintenance, and makes a mutual dependence the connecting bond between a chief and his dependents, runs through several archaic words denoting the states of social condition, and carries us back to the most remote period in which government existed. That the latter arose with the first man who became sufficiently rich (a word in Sanskrit and the Gothic dialects synonymous with powerful) to subsist others, that is, to feed them while they tended his herds, tilled his ground, hunted for him, and fought for him, can admit of no reasonable doubt; for even in the pastoral state there were occasions for the exercise of strength and courage in the repression of invaders, and the defence of the right of primary occupancy.* A reciprocal obligation upon the state or ruler and the subject, the one to obey and render personal aid in peril and difficulty, and the other to provide the means of livelihood, is the first germ of government, and it is discernible wherever man is to be found. To look for the origin of the feudal system in the comparatively recent senate and emperors of Rome, is to reject the plain testimony of history sustained by the results of comparative etymology. In like manner, to consider the antient Germans as its founders, is to limit the survey of mankind to a small section. The account of these people, given by Tacitus, is valuable chiefly as the first description of a system of feods in Europe before the term feod was transferred exclusively to land. Their Asiatic ancestors had ages before made use of the same means of securing defenders of the general property, rewarding, taxing and punishing in the very same manner that the Germans introduced into the subjugated provinces of the Roman empire. The Romans themselves had done the same thing; but when Tacitus wrote, all memory of the feudal system was lost; for it had been obliterated some centuries before by the overpowering influence of municipalities. The senate and its fathers, the patrician order, the decemviri, comitia, and some other institutions were relics, of which none knew what was the origin.

* Journ. Asiat. I, p. 65; Col. Tod, I, p. 131.

9. Tacitus, in words which have been noticed, closely describes a feod, where he states that the chief was bound to protect and maintain with food and lodging those retainers who constituted his company or band. The Germans either abandoned this principle when they marched towards Rome, or they took it with them. In the latter case, the expedition was a common enterprise for the glory and profit of all who were joined in it. The very fact that Clovis

* Lot and Abraham had flocks and herds and tents; "and the land was not able to bear them, that they might not dwell together; for their substance was great. And there was a strife between the herdsmen of Abraham's cattle and the herdsmen of Lot's cattle."—Gen. XIII.

CHAP.
IV.

M. de Boulainvilliers holds that Gaul was not considered the patrimony of the princes.

in the anecdote cited, solicited the piece of plate from the barons proves that he had no greater right in it than themselves, and the conduct of the soldier who dissented from their acquiescence in his wishes, proves that the barons had no greater right in it than the meanest of their followers. "It is impossible," says Mr. Hallam, "to resist the inference which is supplied by this story: the whole behaviour of Clovis is that of a barbarian chief, not daring to withdraw anything from the rapacity, or to chastise the rudeness of his followers."* Yet Mr. Hallam does not seem to extend the inference to the territory acquired by the confederate Franks and their leader Clovis. The sensible reflections on this subject offered by the Count de Boulainvilliers ought to have weight in an inquiry free from the bias of a preconceived theory of feudal principles and customs. 'The conquest of Gaul by the Franks,' he says, 'is commonly regarded only in relation to the chief of the enterprise—but we forget the entire nation, and are no longer embarrassed about its fate, just as if the expedition of Clovis were comparable to that of Alexander, who conquered Persia for himself and at his own charge. I have always been disgusted with the blundering of our historians, who, without one exception, have in this respect been wanting in exactitude and fidelity to the principle, and in fact it is to this title,—the most deceitful that can be imagined,—that we must refer the common idea which represents Gaul, and now France, as the patrimony of Clovis and his successors: it is no longer remembered that in the beginning, Clovis was only the general of a free army which had elected him to conduct it in enterprises, of which the glory and the profit were to be the common property.'†

*Growth of
monarchical power.*

10. When the conquest of the empire was achieved, and the allotments of the land completed, the object of the invading army was accomplished; and, as Beda remarks of

* Middle Ages, I, 109.

† Essai Historique, dans son Etat de la France, t. I, p. 15.

the Saxon aldoras, the general became, in respect to power, no more than his companions in the expedition of the rank of chiefs. They separated; each chief accompanied by his own followers retired to his allotment, on which he erected an independent sovereignty: thus dukes, counts, barons, castellans, and vavasors are found at a later period exercising all the functions of royalty within the limits of their fiefs. If, at the partition of the conquered territory, the general was complimented or rewarded with larger domains than the rest, he had no power out of those domains, and but little within them, as is manifest from the well known fact, that no act, not even a charter granted by the Merovingian princes was efficient until it had received the patronising sign-manual of the mayor of the palace. When Childebert, king of Austrasia, invaded Italy in 531, his army was composed of twenty dukes, under each of whom were four counts, who had each several viscounts at his command, and the viscounts had each several *thungiats or centurions; yet this subordination had properly place only in the army; for long after this period, counts and dukes were of equal rank, and viscounts and smaller proprietors were kings in miniature on their own estates. Each possessed a household consisting of officers of state with the very same titles that are found attributed to the persons who composed the establishment of Charlemagne. It is a common error to consider these smaller households as imitations of the regal and imperial; for the case is the reverse, the latter being no more than augmentations in magnificence with every accession of wealth and power. The barons exercised all the functions of royalty within their fiefs, both before and after the consolidation of power in an individual. We know it because their rights were never the subject of royal grants, but are often that of confirmations of privileges formally claimed, as existing

* Sic, (ibid. p. 38.) They are the tungini of the Salic Law: "Tunginus aut centenarius mallem indicent."—Tit. 46, n. 1.

CHAP.
IV.

“de jure antiquo,” and they are so confirmed in the charters. As the power of the king grew, that of the nobles decreased, until at length the functions of miniature royalty entirely ceased, and the whole state became a single government under laws which extended alike to all its parts, and not as before, varying with the different customs established by the barons in their several domains. Nothing is more erroneous than the common opinion that kingdoms were originally divided into separate provinces governed by great nobles, to whom powers and privileges were granted by the monarch.* The opposite process took place: they are the aggregates of allotments which existed from the earliest acquisition of territory, and the consolidated power of each monarch as it is now seen, is the result of successful and happy usurpations on the rights of the petty sovereigns, many of whose titles are extant as those of an order of no-

* Sullivan argues for the power of the King in the following passage, relating more particularly to the Franks:—

“Though things in general wore the same face as when these people remained at home, a change was insensibly introducing; the king and chieftains were gradually increasing their privileges at the expense of the common soldiers, an event partly to be ascribed to the general assemblies being less frequent, and consequently fewer opportunities occurring for the people at large to exert their power; but principally to the many years they had spent in camp before they thought themselves secure enough to disperse through the country. The strictness of military discipline, and that prompt and unlimited obedience its laws require, habituated them to a more implicit submission to their leaders, who from the necessities of war were generally continued in command. And it is no wonder that while the authority of the inferior lords was thus every day gaining strength, that the king should increase more considerably. For probably because he, as general, was the fittest person to distribute the conquered lands to each, according to his merits, he about this time assumed to himself, and was quietly allowed the power of the partition of lands. They were still, and for some considerable time longer, assigned in the general assemblies, but according to his sole will and pleasure, to the several lords, who afterwards subdivided them in the same manner at their discretion, whence it came that these grants were called benefices, and are constantly described by the old writers as flowing from the pure bounty and benevolence of the lord.”—Hist. Feud. Law, p. 48, 9.

bility before the time of Hugh Capet. The regal power grew by encroaching upon the rights of the primitive chiefs of the people. And it may have been under this monarch that the notion of an individual proprietor of the soil began to assume a more decisive character.

11. From the year 519 to 996, the monarchy continued in a nominal state: the great chiefs, under different titles, which they appear to have adopted at pleasure, sometimes styling themselves counts, sometimes dukes, and very frequently count-dukes, or counts and dukes, taxed their people, levied war, and exercised all the functions proper to royalty, just as if there were no king; but whenever the general warfare required it, they marched their forces to his standard, and co-operated in effecting the common object under his command. In all there appears to be the original and principal feature of feudalism; yet we are required to believe that it did not exist until the property in the land was imagined to be centered in the monarch.*

*Petty
sovereigns.*

12. Mr. Hallam excludes the Scandinavian nations from the list of people who were influenced by feudal principles;† yet if the historian, Swein Aggonson, who wrote about 1186, may be credited, the kings of Denmark possessed the whole land of the kingdom by right of proprietorship

*Feodalism
in Denmark and Scandina-
via.*

* Bishop Nicholson, in his learned dissertation on this subject, distinguishes the feudal law into several periods which he calls its birth, infancy, youth, and state of perfection. The first he limits from the time of the irruption of the Northern nations, which happened about the beginning of the fifth century, to the year 650. Its infancy from 650 to 800. The third period from this year to 1027, soon after which it arrived at its state of perfection.—St. Amand, Historical Essay, p. 38. The first period of the system must be included between its origin and the reduction of its rules to a written form. Traces of feodality exist in all the Barbaric codes, which, as will be shown, have all the marks of being older laws inadequately translated into Latin; except those of the Anglo-Saxons, which are probably revisions of Continental laws, and into which Monkish lawyers interpolated passages copied from Scripture, thus blending pagan institutes with Mosaic and Christian precepts.

† Middle Ages, I, 143.

CHAP.
IV.

from the first establishment of the monarchy;* and the very chapter in which this is stated, relates to a service performed by all classes, at the command of the queen, for the common safety. But without insisting upon an isolated circumstance, it will be shown from the vernacular Sagas or histories that feudalism prevailed all over Scandinavia.† Thus we have a strange contradiction in consequence of considering that as a fundamental principle, which in reality was no principle at all, but an excrescence of recent growth. In France, where the land continued to be the common property, there is said to be feudalism; while in Denmark, where it was the property of an individual, we are told there was no feudalism. With respect to Sweden, which is also excepted, all that is necessary to be said at present, is, that the glossary of Loccenius is a work undertaken to prove that all the chief terms employed in the feudal laws have their origin in the language, laws, and institutions of ancient Gothland.

*Feudalism
in central India.*

13. When Colonel Tod had successfully established the close conformity between the feudal system of Mewar, in central India, with that which prevailed in Europe, the objection that the sovereign was not the proprietor of the soil, was accompanied by the observation, that "traits of resemblance, however striking in respect to martial customs, between nations which have nothing else in common, whose languages, creeds and civil customs are radically dissimilar, may afford matter for curious disquisition and nothing more." To show the value that is to be placed upon this decision,

* "Nam prout regni regimen obtinuit, ita tunc temporis universam regni tellurem reges jure dominii possidebant."—Compend. Hist. Dan. c. 3.

† Gentlemen who are accustomed to give peremptory decisions on the ancient customs of a country, would do well to make themselves acquainted with its language. Those who deny that Denmark and Sweden were influenced by feudal principles will, perhaps, explain why the words "hulds-kap, troskap och manskap" formed a necessary part of the obligation of the Swedes on the election of their ancient kings, and why on solemn occasions people vowed their "fealty, truth and homage," if they were not under feudal obligations.

which appears in the Edinburgh Review for 1830, it is only necessary to turn to the volume for 1808 for a very learned comparison between the Sanskrit and the languages of Europe, which the writer demonstrates to be so clearly related that even the conjugations of the verbs are formed upon the very same principle, and with the same terminations, a little modified in the latter. With respect to customs, they have been so often shown to be identical that they may be passed over; and as to creeds, they certainly can have no relation to the subject. Asia, however, was the birthplace of Christianity.

14. Pinkerton, with a just notion of the feudal polity as existent wherever there was a mutual obligation and dependence between a chief and his tenants or followers, restricts the commencement of it to the rise of the passion for military conquest. "The feudal system, about which so much noise is made," he says, "is the natural fruit of conquest, and is as old in the world as conquest. A territory is acquired, and the state or the general bestows it on leaders and soldiers on condition of military service, and of tokens of acknowledging gratitude to the donors. It was known in the Greek heroic ages. It was known to Lycurgus, for all the lands in Sparta were held on military tenure. It was known to Romulus when he regulated Rome. It was known to Augustus when he gave lands to his veterans on condition that their sons at fifteen years of age do military service. The reason it did not preponderate and corrupt in Greece and Rome, was that it was stifled by the necessary effects of cities, as above mentioned. In Persia, where there were no cities of any power or privilege, it preponderated and corrupted at an early period. The feudal system, whether in its original democracy, or corrupted into aristocracy, must limit the power of kings; for men who held their possessions on military service, must of course have arms in their hands; and even in absolute governments, the soldiers are free, witness the Prætorian bands, and armies of imperial Rome, and the Turkish Jani-

Pinkerton on its universality.

CHAP.
IV.

zaries. By the feudal system, every man held freedom and life in his hands. Montesquieu has begun his account of the feudal system with that of the ancient Germans, given by Tacitus, and prides himself on leaving off where others began. A writer more profound would leave off where Montesquieu begins.* There is, however, a very great convenience in pursuing the same course as the profound writer, who seems to be slighted in this passage. Holding the well grounded opinion of M. St. Martin, that the feudal system was not a native of Germany, the account of Tacitus is a description of it at a given epoch, to which we can refer past and present institutions in Europe, and beyond which we can readily ascend by the aid of analogy and etymology. "The feudal system in Europe," says Mr. Richardson, "is an exotic plant; but in the East it is indigenous, universal, and immemorial. In India, Persia, Tartary, and other eastern countries, the whole detail of government, from the most ancient accounts down to the present hour, can hardly be defined by any other description than feudal."†

*Patton, on pastoral
feodalism.*

15. On the origin of feodality, Mr. Patton observes, "the circumstance of land being common, or the property of the society, and never possessed among individuals among the pastoral tribes, seems to offer a natural explanation of the rise and progress of the Asiatic constitution of monarchical government, which is uniformly and unalterably despotic. These peculiarities have been shewn to depend upon the absolute property of the land being vested in the sovereign, which precludes the rivalship of power through the means of the greatest land proprietors, who cannot possibly exist under such circumstances. But how this absolute property of the land of the state came originally to be vested in the monarch or sovereign, is the question which it is so difficult to answer. If we suppose the pastoral state of society to have universally preceded the agricultural state in Asia, a supposition not void of historical import, a very obvious explanation seems to result from it. Among all pastoral tribes, the monarchical form of government is prevalent; the chief is the representative of the public, and in time of war is absolute. The first and earliest transition from the pastoral to the agricultural state of society must always remain a subject for conjecture.*

* Dissert. on the origin and progress of the Scythians or Goths, p. 139.

† Dissert. prefixed to his Persian Dictionary, p. 42, 3.

16. Some observations by Col. Tod, introductory to his detailed account of the feudal institutions of Rajasthan, are deserving of close attention: "There is a martial system," he says, "peculiar to these Rajpoot states, so extensive in its operation as to embrace every object of society." This is so analogous to the ancient feudal system of Europe, that I have no hesitation to hazard a comparison between them, with reference to a period when the latter was imperfect. In the same stages of society, the wants of man must everywhere be similar, and will produce the analogies which are observed to regulate Tatar hordes or German tribes, Caledonian clans, and the Rajpoot Cula (race) or Jhareja Bhyad (brotherhood). All the countries of Europe participated in the system, which we denominate feudal; and we can observe it in various degrees of perfection or deterioration from the mountains of Caucasus to the Indian Ocean. In remarking the various coincidences between the habits, notions, and governments of Europe in the middle ages, and those of Rajasthan, it is not absolutely necessary that we should conclude that one system was borrowed from the other; each may in truth be said to have the patriarchal form for its basis. Attention to distinctions, though often merely nominal, will aid us in discovering the outlines of a picture, which must at some period have been more finished; when real power unrestrained by modern influence upheld a system, the plan of which was original. It is in these remote regions, so little

*Tod, on the martial system
of the Rajpoots.*

* Principles of Asiat. Monarchies, p. 268, 270.

CHAP.
IV.

known to the western world, and where original manners lie hidden under those of the conquerors, that we may search for the germs of the constitutions of European states. The perfection of the system in England is due to the Normans, who brought it from Scandinavia, whither it was probably conveyed by Odin and the Sacasenæ, or by anterior migrations from Asia, which would coincide with Richardson's hypothesis, that it was introduced from Tartary. Although speculative reasoning forms no part of my plan, yet when I observe analogy on the subject in the customs of the antient German tribes, the Franks, or Gothic races, I shall venture to note them. Of one thing there is no doubt,—knowledge must have accompanied the tide of migration from the East; and from higher Asia emerged the Asi, the Catti, and the Cimbric Lombard, who spread the system in Scandinavia, Friesland and Italy.*

*Turkish
timar.*

17. A strong resemblance has been noticed between the military feods of the west and the Turkish timars or lands of the Spahis, for the enjoyment of which they served in the field on horseback. Each feudatory brought into the field a number of horses in proportion to his tenements; so the Spahis, who, says Dr. Walsh, "are a kind of feudal cavalry, possessing hereditary lands on the tenure of appearing in the field when called on. If they have no male children, the lands descend to the commander, who assigns them to others on the same terms, and so the corps is kept up."† The grant of a fief, (gras,) by the Maharana Dheraj to his nephew Komar Madhu Sing-ji, in 1729, is conceived in the following terms:

*Mewar
putta.*

"M. Dh. &c. to his nephew &c. commanding.

"Gras has been granted.

"The fief, (putta,‡) of Rampoor, that with 1000 horse and

* Annals of Rajasthan, I, p. 129, 130, 1.

† Narrative of a Journey from Constantinople, 1828, p. 186.

‡ It might be explained a lordship, as the Sanskrit pati, (suprà, p. 41,) becomes put, a lord.

2000 foot you will perform service during six months annually, and when foreign service is required, 3000 foot and 3000 horse.

CHAP.
IV.

“ While the power of the presence, (thugoor,) is maintained in these districts, you will not be dispossessed.

“ By command, &c.”

The Persian jagirs are fiefs held on the same conditions. Persian jagir.
“ A jagir,” says Mr. Richardson, “ is a possession in land granted by the king for life, and the holder of such land is a jagir dar.” In Sanskrit jagara is a coat of mail.

18. If we owe our languages to Asia, of which, while a single verse of the Vedas or Puranas exists, there never can be started a doubt worth the trouble of confutation by argument, we may well be supposed to have derived the feudal system from the same quarter. But fully agreeing with the Edinburgh Reviewer of Colonel Tod, that the tenure of lands on the condition of military service, which is an expedient so simple, and withal so obvious in order to provide for public defence, must everywhere produce incidents more or less alike,* we cannot be surprised to find the like system in other parts of the world. Major Denham discovered traces of it in Bornou, in the interior of Africa. Feodalism in Africa. “ A feudal law exists there in full force, and a man unwilling to serve provides one or more substitutes, according to his means.”† From the accounts of the Sandwich Islands by their discoverers, nothing is more certain than the use of military fiefs by a people who could not have borrowed their knowledge of it from the Roman law of one writer, or the beneficiary grants of the Frank monarch, to which another assigns the origin of the European system. The king granted out lands to the chiefs who held them by military service and an annual rent (the veisla and len of Scandinavia), and these chiefs made subinfeodations; they subdivided their fiefs, grants, among their followers, who held them on the same conditions as their lords.

* Vol. for 1830, p. 52.

† Travels, p. 150.

CHAP.
IV.

*Feodalism
among the Caucasian tribes.*

19. After what has been said, it seems almost superfluous to add the testimony of the Chevalier de Marigny, who found the feudal system in Circassia; yet where facts apparently incontestible are disputed, it is not altogether useless to learn that the inhabitants of Caucasus retain a form of polity which was once universal. He says in his Three Voyages in the Black Sea, that the "Circassians, very much in the same manner as those who existed in Europe in the feudal ages, live from father to son in a state of dependence, under a prince whose fields they cultivate in time of peace, and whom they defend in time of war." In many particulars, mutatis mutandis, the description of the Germans by Tacitus might be transferred to this warlike people. The division into princes, nobles (usdens), and people, is the same, and so are their duties. A certain number of people are attached to the household of each prince, who acts as their judge, protector and father. As the land is the property of the state, the possessions of the prince consist of horses, arms and slaves. His expenditure is supported by tributes extorted from surrounding nations. His power is absolute in time of war, but in peace he is not distinguished from the usdens, or even the peasants. On great occasions, the whole community assembles in deliberation: the oldest of the princes proposes a measure; it is then debated among the usdens, and afterwards among the deputies of the people. It is needless to pursue the subject. We find in Circassia a preference given to age, which could not obtain among a nomadic and predatory people like the Germans, and which argues the attainment of a higher grade of civilization.

In Livonia.

20. Until May, 1818, feodality existed in full vigour among the Livonians. The proprietors assembled in congress in that month, and formally emancipated the serfs, who at first considered it to be a deprivation of their ancient privileges, and in consequence earnestly remonstrated against the measure. It was probably by this path that Odin and the Asi introduced it into Scandinavia.

21. If there were people in Europe before the entrance of the Asiatic tribes, there was undoubtedly a system of feods. "The primary institution of feods," says Mr. Whitaker, "is unanimously deduced by our legal and historical antiquaries from the northern invaders of the Roman empire; and the primary introduction of them into this island is almost as unanimously referred to the much more recent epocha of the Norman conquest. But they certainly existed among us before, and even formed the primitive establishment of the Britons."* His reasons for this opinion are irresistible, and if the Britons availed themselves of this, the most obvious and most facile mode of defence, it may be concluded that, as the manners and religion of the Keltic races were as similar as their dialects, all the others also possessed a system of feods.

CHAP.
IV.

Among the Britons.

22. That the feudal system was the same in all these countries would be as absurd to maintain, as that the feudal institutions of the Anglo-Saxons were the same as those which were introduced by the Normans, after many additions had been made to the simple form, and many consequences deduced from the principle and its correlative maxims, of which neither German nor Asiatic had ever thought. Some of these excrescences were the effect of the altered position of the German invaders of the Roman territories; and others of later growth were no doubt suggested by the Theodosian code. Yet in all these varieties, and under these changes, and whether the property of the land were vested in the prince, in the collective body of the people, or, as in Circassia at the present day, in the individuals of the nobles and people, a system of defence founded on the principle of obligation and protection, the bond of union severing with the failure of the condition of tenure and obedience, existed, and was to all intents and purposes a feudal system. If the titles of the European nobility are feudal titles in origin, nothing is more certain, as will be

Though not always the same, recognisable.

* Hist. of Manchester, I, p. 262.

CHAP.
IV.

amply shown, than their priority to the conquest of Rome; and if they are subsequent to the additions made in the feudal system, their significations, which refer to institutions that existed when Tacitus described the Germans, are without application, and the problem would be, how they continued to be applied to persons whom they did not denote.

Benefices.

23. One learned and elegant writer* discovers the origin of feods in the beneficiary grants of the French monarchs, and yet “beneficium” and “munus,” the terms to which he refers, are nothing more than Latin translations† of veisla and len, and fæde and lehn, which denoted a feod in different points of view, and which, by force of their import, take us far beyond the guidance of history. But if these grants were the parents of a system, there is at present totally unexplained, the principle which united the northern nations, carried them into the Roman territory, and dictated the partition of land among the leaders of the enterprise; and which constituted those leaders so many petty sovereigns ready to unite under a single leader for the common defence.

Romans.

24. Another gentleman, also highly and deservedly distinguished in literature, finds the origin of the system in what he terms the decrees of the Roman senate and the rescripts of the emperors.‡ Others again have directly pointed to the grants by Alexander Severus and Probus to the veterans, as the first indication of feods in Europe. On these grounds it seems necessary, at the risk of repetition or of familiar quotation, to consider the probabilities of deductions so plausibly supported, and so respectably recommended.

25. Believing the feudal polity to have existed in the most remote ages, and to have been diffused coequally with society, it is necessary to contract inquiry into the narrow bounds of that state of it, of which vestiges remain in the titles of honor, and denominations of offices of dignity now in use over the greater part of Europe. Since many of them belong to the primitive languages of the Indo-European races, their origin may be referred to the earliest migration from Asia, whether that were two thousand or more years before the Christian era. The conformity which exists among these languages, including both Greek and Latin, which were once supposed to be distinct and original tongues, and to which a false philology looked for the parentage of words indigenous to Gothic forms of speech, is to be accounted for on the reasonable supposition, that very early "German tribes burst out of Asia and wandered westward; that having then remained some time to the north of the Danube, and become over populous, a portion of them went to the north, another portion southward, while a third remained behind: the northern portion probably went to Sweden over the Danish Islands, while the southern crossed the Danube and the Alps, and there took and retained possession of Italy." History says nothing of all this; but history says just as little of the peopling of Scandinavia by German people, and yet no one dreams of denying this. Why too, when we know that Britain, Gaul and Spain were so peopled, should we make an exception in favour of Italy, which lies so directly in the road? The silence of the Roman historians on this point proves nothing one way or the other. Their old traditions were lost, (no thanks, by the way, to themselves, if the tale of Brennus be true) and as, when they began to write history, they were corrupted by Grecian influence, they looked in everything for a Grecian origin; moreover, they knew absolutely nothing of the northern nations; yet even the Greek authors had a remarkable tradition that they came from the Land of Oaks.*

* Hallam, Middle Ages.

† Beneficium was first used in this sense in the reign of Clovis.—Dominici de Alodiis, c. 8.

‡ Sir F. Palgrave, Hist. of Engl. Commonwealth, vol. I, p. 77.

* "One of the names of Germany: 'Sonst hiess es nur das Land der

CHAP.
IV.

*Cimbri and Teutons offer to become Vassals of Rome, ante
Chr. 117.*

26. The distribution of the land by Romulus, the three orders of the people, the election of the magistrates in the meetings of the hundreds, the appellation of patres given to their noblemen, and the vast number of Latin words identical with words used by the most remote of the Germanic tribes, are circumstances, which together with a remarkable conformity in popular customs and mythological traditions, strongly favour a belief that the Romans were of a Teutonic family.* After the abolition of the monarchy, the feudal system gradually disappeared in the growing importance of cities and municipalities, which, with the diffusion of wealth in the form of money, jewels, and moveables, necessarily diminished the power of the nobles. When the Cimbri and Teutons, who invaded Spain in the third Cimbric and Teutonic war, about a century before our era, proposed to hold lands of the Republic, as became a martial people, by military service, all knowledge of this kind of tenure seems to have been forgotten by the Romans. They petitioned the state, says the historian Florus, “ut martius populus aliquid sibi terræ daret quasi stipendium, cæterum, ut vellet, manibus atque armis uteretur.”† An offer of vassalage in return for a fief, or a request for a fief in lieu of pay for military service, could not well have been more explicitly worded in the twelfth century. Whatever the Romans may have understood the nature of the request to have been, it proves that military tenure was familiar to these branches of the Germanic and perhaps Scandinavian races. It is equally evident that they did not regard their request as derogating from that freedom of which they were enthusiastic slaves, and of which among all their nations

Eichen.’ Körners Leyer und Schwert, p. 23.”—Foreign Q. Review, Vol. X. German Origin of the Latin Language.

* As might be expected, the more ancient language of Rome bears the strongest resemblance to the Germanic forms of speech; thus the Song of the Arval Brothers (Carmen Fratrum Ambarvalium), inexplicable to the mere classic, is read with comparative ease by the Teutonic scholar.

† L. III. c. 1.

the possession of arms was at once the means, the fruit, and the token.

CHAP.
IV.

27. The writings of Cæsar and Tacitus gave the Romans nearly all the knowledge they had of the polity, manners and customs of these barbarians; for the information collected by the travelling merchants of whom we find mention, would be mostly confined to people of their own profession. It may be said with an appearance of truth, that before the Christian era, the Romans knew nothing of the Germans more than their passion for war and the difficulty of conquering them. For the first time they learned, in the reign of Trajan, that there were kings who were honored and obeyed, although they possessed nothing of the regal condition but the title, and ranked in the state only as the first of the nobility.* They learned that no affairs of importance among the Germans were transacted without the concurrence of the common people, who attended the national councils with arms in their hands; and such of the Romans as reflected on this circumstance, perceived that where the sword and spear entered into the consultation, there was little prospect of the subversion of liberty by the chiefs. They learned moreover that there was a people to whom the use of money was unknown, and who were content to serve the state at home and abroad on the sole condition of receiving food and entertainment; and they found what could not well exist in an atmosphere of despotism, an order of men who were the friends and companions of the sovereign. In everything, in short, which these judicious writers have described, the Romans beheld a striking contrast to their own usages and institutions. Whatever the Germans or Gallo-Belgians had in common with the Romans, neither Cæsar nor Tacitus thought it worth his while to mention.

*Germans
little known to the Romans*

* "Nihil est manifestius, quam reges hos fuisse itidem ut Laconicas, nomine solo, re vero ipsa nihil nisi optimatum primos."—Grotius de Antiq. Reip. Batav.

CHAP.
IV.Germanic titles imitated.

Comites.

Gesidhas.

28. The Romans soon began to imitate the barbarians, and adopted several of their peculiarities. Among others, it must be accounted the most remarkable, that they copied the Germanic order of companions. Tacitus calls them comites, and it is an object of interest and, indeed, importance to the consideration of the origin of European titles of nobility, to ascertain what vernacular term is represented by the Latin. A private man who has a number of associates prefers some to others, and they themselves present different aspects to an observer in relation to that person. The companions of a public man will not differ from those of a private person, but either they are likely to be distinguished by a peculiar appellation, or a word of general application will acquire a particular sense, and become in a manner appropriated to these companions. That this was the case among the Germans appears certain from the fact, that the Anglo-Saxon, gesidh, and the Old High German, gisindo, denoted a companion, and were long the title of a nobleman of the rank of comes or count. Such too, was the gasind-us of the Lombards in the courts of their princes;* and gasindium, was the Latinized Gothic for the household of a duke. The question then arises whether these words primarily imply a companion, and in what sense? If a companion, as now understood, Tacitus has translated a title which is as old as the language. In Anglo-Saxon, sidh, is a journey, and with the collective particle ge, it forms gesidh, a fellow traveller. The Gothic gasindhai, company, shows that there must have been sindh, a journey, in that language, and so it may be observed of gisindo, the Germanic correspondent of gesidh. In this point of view, the terms denote the companions who undertook the expedition from Asia into Europe somewhere about 3000 years ago; but to render this more probable it is necessary to ascertain the existence and import of the term in Sanskrit. And here a difficulty besets the inquirer. It is not easy, unless the word itself be found in that language, to determine whether the nunnation be servile or radical, and consequently whether the n have been dropped in Anglo Saxon, or be an insertion in the Gothic, similar to what has been observed to take place in some other words of a like construction.* If it be the former, the etymon is discoverable in the phrase, “Snihchati çithye guruh,”—the master has affection for his disciple. The root of this word, which might be written shithi or sithi, will not account for the sense of sidh in Anglo Saxon, which has the verb sidhian, to make a journey, derived from it. Siddhi, a magical shoe, which transports the wearer safely and rapidly whithersoever he chooses, is a Sanskrit word resembling the Saxon in orthography and, in some respects, in sense, but it can hardly have been the etymon sought. If the n be radical, we have in Sanskrit, sindha, a chief, a lion; sindhana, a war cry; sindhasan, a throne, supported by lions, and some other compounds, of which the principal root is said to be simi, to injure or kill.

* "De gasindis vero nostris volumus, ut quicumque ex minimis causis fuerit, in tali ordine pro eo, quod nobis deservire videtur, &c."—Lex Longob. l. I. tit. 34, n. 1. In Marculfus (Formul. l. I, form. 23.) gasindi denotes friends, trusty vassals, &c.—Du Cange, t. III, c. 836.

29. Resorting to conjecture, the Anglo Saxon, sidh, a Gesidh. journey, is probably the true form of the word, and the n in the Gothic and German is an addition on principles peculiar to those dialects. The Sanskrit root, shidh, which signifies Sidh. in one class of verbs, to go; in another, to promote welfare, govern or direct; and in the fourth class, to accomplish or complete anything, has the best pretensions to be the etymon; for it coincides with the analysis of the Anglo Saxon gesidh, and it exactly corresponds with the office of the comes, who, according to Tacitus, was both the prince’s companion in military expeditions, and a judge or governor of a district. The sithi, a disciple, before mentioned, pro- Sithi.

* Suprà p. 17, 18.

CHAP.
IV.

ceeds from this root. A little more trouble than was absolutely necessary, has been taken with this ancient title of nobility, because Wachter has represented it as primarily denoting a servant or domestic, and gespan and gesell, as first signifying persons in a servile condition, whence they gradually came to be applied to the nobles, because among the Hungarians, gespan is comes, or one who accompanies the person of the king.

The Sanskrit Sithi, one who accompanies a teacher, becomes with the collective ge, in Anglo-Saxon and in Old German, the appellation of the prince's companions in military expeditions and civil government, and the assistants in his councils.* They formed a House of Lords deliberating under the oaks of the German forests, and in all probability did so before the hordes had penetrated so far into Europe. A punctilious translator could not render the Latin word comes, by gesidh, because the latter conveys ideas that cannot be expressed without a circumlocution. If such a translator met with gesidh, he must write, “comes expeditionis bellicæ,”—“comes peregrinationis militaris,” or use some equivalent periphrasis. This difficulty happens in all languages, and is the reason that a translation is always less forcible than the original, and sometimes altogether inefficient in expressing the exact meaning of a foreign author. For single terms, it may be taken as a rule in deciding upon their relative antiquity, that they are older than the corresponding periphrase in a different language. When Cæsar could not mention the ambacti and soldurii of the Belgic Gauls without circumlocution, which he appears to have studiously avoided, he adopted the words themselves; and if Tacitus had adopted the same method, it would never have been imagined that comes, weak by the generality of its signification, was the original of the Teutonic title.

† The old Spanish title Cid, is Moorish, from the Arabic, el seid, but seems to have little connexion with the Sanskrit.

30. In the days of chivalry, the knight, no matter what were his civil rank, was accounted the friend and companion of his prince, who was himself a knight. It may be presumed that such were the gesidhas. Like the knights, they were numerous, and like them considered as an ornament in peace and a safeguard in war. So much indeed, were they regarded in this light, that Ammianus Marcellinus, a judicious writer, frequently employs the term, "Satellites," as synonymous with "comites," when speaking of these persons among the Goths and Alamanni.*

31. There are, in public as in private life, acquaintances, companions and friends, who may be comprehended under one general term. Selden, who holds that European titles originated in the empire of the Cæsars, says, in reference to the friends and companions of the Eastern emperors: "If Tiberius had not such a kind of comites and amici, and so distinguished them also, I understand not that of Suetonius in his Life: 'Pecuniæ parcus et tenax, (saith he) comites peregrinationum expeditionumque nunquam salario, cibariis tantum, sustentavit.'† Here are not only the title but the very condition of the union between the German princes and their comites, which Tacitus subsequently described, and which Tiberius had personally witnessed in operation in Germany. The "epulæ et convictus pro stipendio," given to the German nobles, were imitated by an emperor with whom there could be no familiarity of companionship, because there was none of the liberty which was the distinguishing feature of the German governments both then and long afterwards.

*Comites
and Amici.*

Selden, from whom one dissents with hesitation, continues the quotation from the Life of Tiberius, as follows: "Uno modo liberalitate ex indulgentia vitrici persecutus, cum tribus classibus factis pro dignitate cujusque primæ sex centa sestertia, secundæ quingenta distribuit, ducenta

* See examples in Cluver. Germ. Antiq. l. I. c. 48.

† Titles of Honor, p. 296.

CHAP.
IV.

tertiæ: quam non Amicorum sed Gratorum appellabat.” Here are his comites, which are plainly those that are near him, and here are they also divided into three ranks. Only his pleasure was to change the name of Amici in the third rank into Grati. And the fashion of having near followers of several ranks, and that in a professed distinction of them, was in that state before the empire of the Cæsars. Seneca runs the first use of it to Gracchus and Livius Drusus.”

The beauty and convenience of having about his person a troop of warlike friends, in the manner of the German princes, may have pleased a monarch like Tiberius. To be enabled to retreat within an impregnable fortress of shields, as the Germans poetically designated the friendly body-guard of their princes,* was certainly a desirable advantage, which the latter possessed over the mighty Cæsars, and would naturally incite a tyrant to imitation. In order to form a correct judgment, we ought to bear in mind that nearly a century had elapsed since Julius Cæsar had men-

* Skialldborg, a castle of shields, in the antient compositions of Scandinavia, was the appellation of the royal bodyguard of friends and companions: “Raufst tha skialldborg fyrir Huna kongum, og skiptust their bræthr hoggum vid.” The shieldburgh before the king of the Huns, was broken through, and the brothers exchanged blows.—Hervarar Saga, c. 19. So also the term was employed by the Saxons:—

Fagum swyrdum	With stained swords
hæleth hige rofe	the glorious heroes
herpadh worhton	a war path wrought,
thurh lathra gemong	through the loathed crew
linde heowon	they hewed their targets,
scild burh scæron:	their shieldburgh divided.

Judith, l. 605.

Bordweall, a wall of shields, is synonymous:

He bræc thone bord weall	He broke the shieldwall,
and with tha beornas feaht.	and with the nobles fought.

Byrhlnoth, l. 580.

In l. 480 it seems to mean a tortoise:

Fole totwæmed	The host was divided,
scyldburh tobrocen	the shieldburgh broken.

tioned these very "comites peregrinationis expeditionum-que," as common among the Gauls, who were partly a German people. And what is this title but the explanation of gesidhas, in a language which possessed no term corresponding in import? The opportunities of observing the manners of the Teutons were greatly increased among the Romans in the reign of Tiberius by the progress and results of the Germanic war. According to Suetonius, forty thousand German captives were transported into Gaul, but Eutropius, with greater appearance of probability, records the number of four hundred thousand. Nor should it be forgotten, that the early part of his military life, was spent by this emperor in Germany, where, if he had never read of such associates in peace and war, he had ample means of acquiring knowledge of them by personal observation.*

32. The Romans were not so fastidious respecting the imitation or adoption of foreign customs as commonly represented. After the time of Tiberius, many German usages found their way even into the imperial palace. One merits particular notice. On the election of a leader, the antient Germans placing him upon their shields, bore him on their shoulders through the camp or station to receive the acclamations of the people. Tacitus describes it as practised among the Batavians on the election of a "dux," to whom they would, ex necessitate, give the appellation of hertug, or leader of the army.† The same rite obtained all over Germania. Cassiodorus mentions it as practised on the election of a king among the Goths at the mouth of the Vistula. Gregory of Tours proves its existence among the Franks on the election of kings Clovis and Gundobold.‡

*Roman
imitation of Germans*

* "Pro dii boni!" exclaims his officer, Paterculus, "quanti voluminis opera insequenti ætate, sub duce Tiberio Cæsare, gessimus! perlustrata armis tota Germania est."—Hist. II. c. 106.

† Igitur ipso, nobilis familiæ nomine placuit; impositusque scuto, more gentis, et sustinentium humeris vibratus, dux deligitur.—Hist. IV.

‡ Hist. Franc. II, c. 40, VIII, c. 10.

CHAP.
IV.

At the end of his eighth book, Herodian says, "Having raised Gordianus Cæsar aloft, they declared him emperor." Capitolinus confirms this statement in like terms. Ammianus and Zosimus relate the elevation of the emperor Julian upon a shield at his election. It was adopted in Greece, and practised in the time of Justinian. Zonaras, in his life of that emperor, says, "Hypatius, who was seditiously chosen in opposition to Justinian, having been raised aloft upon a shield, was saluted king;" and Curopalates, in treating of offices of court, says that 'a new emperor is placed upon a shield and raised aloft.' These and other examples are produced by Cluverius.*

33. Gordian, on whom this German rite was first performed in the imperial army, was elected in 236, nearly three centuries after the proposition of the Teutons to hold lands of the Roman state by military service. About 220 the Romans introduced this kind of tenure for the protection of the frontier provinces; and yet, in the face of all these circumstances, Selden, and after him, Sir Francis Palgrave, ascribe the invention of military tenure, or the feudal system, to the Roman emperor who then governed, and who had himself been a soldier in Germany. The account of the origin of feods given by the former is as follows:

Selden, on the origin of Feods.

34. "Feuds or Feuda (being the same in our laws we call tenancies or lands held, and feuda also, which is but the same word in our feoda militaria), are possessions so given and held, that the possessor is bound by homage and service to him (or those which derive under him), from whom they were given. And the services that are to be performed by the tenants of these lands are various. And frequently rents as well as other services are due out of them to the lords of whom they are held. But although feudum or feud be taken to interpret the very word beneficium, and of itself originally to signify no more,* yet that which really gives it the nature and notion that is now fixt upon it, is the bond of homage or fealty between the lord and the tenant. For without that bond (though it pay rent or other satisfaction upon any contract, either censual, emphyteuticarie, or the like) it cannot be a feud.

* Germ. Antiq. I, c. 46, p. 367.

“Whence this use to give lands by such a rite originally came is much disputed. Some fetch it from the ancient rite of patrons and clients in Rome. But there was only a kind of bond between them, but no possession held by that bond. Others derive it from the Roman deduction of military colonies into subdued countries, so the better to preserve what was won to the empire. Others otherwise. But among the Romans I see not anything so near the just nature of feuds, as those possessions, which were given to such as were their Duces Limitanei, or Dukes of Frontiers in the empire, and the others that spent their time with them in the defence of those frontiers, to be held only on military service. And of those we find express mention under Alexander Severus. He (saith Lampridius) gave such territories as were gained in the frontiers ‘Limitaneis ducibus et militibus, ita ut eorum ita essent, si hæredes illorum militarent, nec unquam ad privatos pertinerent, dicens, attentius eos militaturos si etiam sua rura defenderent.’† Here we see that lands were given to be possessed to them and their heirs, on the tenure of military service to be performed by them. So Probus gave much land in Isauria to his old soldiers, ‘addens (as Vossius saith) ut eorum filii ab anno decimo octavo mares duntaxat ab militiam mitterentur.’ And of this kind were the agri militibus assignati, which are mentioned by Ulpian. Some other like examples are. And so to the time of Alexander

About
A. D. 220.

About 280.

* What does he mean? Benefice does not interpret feudum, although the same thing may be intended by both.

† ‘Lamprid. in Al. Sev. 58.’

CHAP.
IV.

Severus, an original or some use of feuds in the empire may be well referred.”*

*Sir F.
Palgrave
on the same subject.*

Sir Francis Palgrave is more positive on this point, for, having in his margin the words “Feudal Tenures to be traced to the grants made to the Limitanean or Ripuarian soldiery, under Alexander Severus and Probus,” he writes, “In settling upon the soil, the military bodies were at first unbroken. The troops marched in with their standards, and the soldiers of the legion became the inhabitants of the city. But the foundation of these colonies was gradually discontinued. The interior of the subjugated provinces no longer required to be awed by the fear of military execution; yet the danger was not lessened though its scene was removed. The borders were threatened by the barbarians, the destined successors of the Cæsars, and to repress their incursions, the march lands which were gained from the enemy, were granted by Alexander Severus, and afterwards by Probus, to the Limitanean or Ripuarian soldiery, upon conditions well described as containing the germ of the feudal tenures of the middle ages, and which appear to have been adopted as the basis of the defensive system of the empire.”†

Elsewhere the same gentleman says: “In the provinces of Spain or Gaul, which had been civilized by the Roman power, or within the sacred boundaries of Italy, the Goth, the Frank, the Lombard, and the Burgundian, possessed themselves of the villas and farms of the patrician, and held them as he had done, reaping the harvest of the senator, and drinking the produce of his vineyard. All the rights of the conquered were transferred to the conqueror; the warrior inherited both the land and the opulence of the owner, whom he had expelled; and though he was too proud to submit his person to the Roman law, still he could not introduce the usages of Germany without destroying the very form of society subsisting in the countries which he had subdued. Yet many approximations took place; the whole system of the military and other tenures of the Teutonic nations, from the period when they become known to us as the states of the middle ages, must be considered as the result of the intermixture of their own laws and customs with the jurisprudence of Rome; and the first chapters of the history of feudality must be sought in the decrees of the senate and the rescripts of the Cæsars.”*

* Titles of Honor, p. 331, 332.

† Engl. Commonw. vol. I, p. 352-3.

35. There are, however, some considerations which seem to detract much from the influence ascribed to the Roman laws and edicts, and which do not tend to exaggerate the scruples that are here supposed to deter the barbarian conquerors from introducing their own usages, lest they should disturb the form of society. One of the effects of their incursion into the provinces was to depopulate large tracts of country, to eradicate towns, and to convert highly cultivated plains into immense and trackless deserts. Italy itself still bears evidence of the nature and extent of their ravages, and we owe the peculiar meaning of the word waste, as applied to wild, to this very circumstance.

The northern subjugators of the Roman empire did not adopt its laws & customs.

It is well known that the conquerors did not dispossess the

* Vol. I, p. 76, 77. The very different opinion of Judge Blackstone is not to be slightly treated. After quoting from Florus, the petition of the Cimbri and Teutones (Suprà p. 78.), he says:—“The sense of which may be thus rendered; they desired stipendiary lands, (that is feuds,) might be allowed them, to be held by military and other personal services, whenever their lords should call upon them. This was evidently the same constitution that displayed itself more fully about seven hundred years afterwards: when the Salies, Burgundians and Franks broke in upon Gaul, the Visigoths upon Spain, and the Lombards upon Italy; and introduced with themselves this northern plan of polity, serving at once to distribute and to protect the territories they had newly gained. And from hence too it is probable that the emperor Alexander Severus took the hint of dividing lands conquered from the enemy among his generals and victorious soldiery, on condition of receiving military service from them and their heirs for ever.”—Comm. II, 46, 47.

CHAP.
IV.Lots or Sortes of the Barbarians.Alodium.

surviving inhabitants of all their lands; but they neither incorporated them with their own people, nor suffered them to have any voice in the government, which continued in its ancient and elective form. In Italy the Goths divided the land into three parts, one of which remained with the old inhabitants, while they appropriated the others to themselves. The choice was probably determined by drawing lots, according to the ancient custom of the northern warriors. At all events these latter portions are called, in Italy, the Lots of the East Goths;* in Africa, the Lots of the Wendels;† in Spain, the Lots of the West Goths;‡ and in France, the Lots of the Burgundians and Franks.§ In the case of the Franks, the portions taken by themselves had another distinctive appellation, and were called Salic Land, which was afterwards a privilege of ancient possession, so that to be of Salic extraction was a proof and title of nobility under the government of the Franks. The third portion was termed alodium, which Wachter supposes to be the Frankish words an-hlot, single lot, Latinized; but were it so, it would be equally significant of the Salic Land, to which alodium is not applied. Others suppose it to be the Norse all and od, possession,|| or aud, a desert, but the former does not express any peculiarity, and as for the deserts, they were left to be claimed by a more industrious posterity. The possessors of the alodium were the ancient inhabitants, who were permitted to hold it as they had been accustomed under the Roman government, and it was, therefore, hereditary. Whatever the word may mean,

* Sortes Ostrogothorum.—Procop. de B. G. l. I, c. 1.

† Sortes Vandalorum.—Ib. de B. Vand. l. I, c. 1.

‡ Sortes Visigothorum, l. I, tit. 1. capit. 8, 16. Sortes Gothicæ, Ib. tit. 2, c. 1.

§ L. Salic, tit. 62, de Alodis.—Mezeray says that the Franks measured the land, and took only a third or fourth part, which was divided among the chiefs and soldiers.—Histoire de France, l. VI, p. 25. This author does not cite his authorities.

|| Ihre, Pontoppidan cum multis aliis. See also Blackst. Comm. II, 45; where “feodh,” “odhal,” “alldh,” are all derived in this manner.

the landowners were called alodarii, which afterwards became a term of reproach. But there were other titles given to the possessions of the conquerors and the conquered, which seem to be of importance in considering how far the former were likely to study the laws and adopt the customs of the latter. While the lands of the conquerors were proudly named Gothic and Salic land, those of the old inhabitants were styled, in contempt, Roman Land, and the possessors of it, Romans. The reason of this will appear from the fact, that as the conquerors distrusted the alodarii, they required from them neither services nor duty for their land. They knew of no tenure but the military, and they were better soldiers than to trust the vanquished with arms, which, as before remarked, were invariably the token of freedom and a kind of nobility in the wearer. As the alodarii, or Romans, could not be entrusted with arms, they were exempt, from military duty, and excluded from all participation in the government. Thus the appellation of their land, though it might be valuable from its extent, distinguished the vanquished from the victors, and those who had the privilege of freemen in electing the rulers of the state from those who were denied that honor. The Gauls paid tribute to the Franks, but the Frankish landowner paid only with his person. He lived according to no law but the Salic law, the law to which he had been accustomed; but the Gauls followed the Roman law, and were called Romans. All other nations in their eyes were barbarians; and what is astonishing, observes Mezeray, the appellation, Roman, became vile and fell into extreme contempt, while that of Barbarian, rose in honor and esteem.* Barbarian and Gentile were both terms by which the old Romans equally designated such people as were not Romans, conferring the name of provincial on such nations as they reduced to the form of a province. The

CHAP.
IV.

Alodarii.

The appellation Roman, becomes a term of contempt.

* Hist. l. VI, p. 26.

CHAP.
IV.

Origin of the term Gentleman.

northern conquerors naturally received the appellation of Barbarian in an honourable sense, since to be a Roman was to be vanquished and degraded from the manhood on which they particularly valued themselves. Gentile being the synonyme of Barbarian, was received in the same sense by Goth, Frank, and Lombard. Equally with barbarian it distinguished them from the Romans, who were subject to taxes, tributes, and legal disabilities and disparagements from which the gentiles were exempt. Hence, in Latin, they called those who were not Romans, both barbari and gentiles homines. The latter term, in the different kinds of Romance or provincial dialects, gentilsomes, gentils hommes, gentilshombres, and soon answering literally to the old gentil men, given to those whom we now call noblemen and men of good family.* The legal disadvantage of being a Roman may be inferred from the different valuations placed upon the life of a Roman, and that of a Frank or Salian, a Goth, a Ripuarian, a Burgundian, some of which national appellations are synonymous with nobility, as Frank and Salian. Thus the Ripuarian Code has the following laws in succession :

If a Ripuarian slay a stranger Frank, he shall be condemned in 200 shillings.

If he slay a stranger Burgundian, he shall be mulcted 160 shillings.

If he slay a stranger Roman, he shall be fined 100 shillings.

If he slay a stranger Frisian, Aleman, Bavarian or Saxon, he shall be adjudged in 160 shillings.†

* Franc ome and gentil ome, in Romance, freeman, and therefore noble ; and gentleman, and therefore noble.

“ Et maint franc baceler illuec

Feist cevalier avec son fil

Qui furent franc ome et gentil.”

Phil. Mouskes, in Du Cange, v. Gentilis.

† Lex Ripuar. tit. 36. By the Salic law, if a Frank put a Roman in bonds without cause, he was fined 600*d* ; but if the Roman committed this

A similar effect took place in Spain, where the proudest boast of a noble was, that he was "filius Gothi," the descendant of a Goth.* In that country, the life of a Goth was valued at 500 shillings, and that of a Roman at 300 shillings.†

Filius Gothi.

Another reason for suspecting the extent of the influence ascribed to the laws of the Romans over their conquerors, is, that the great distinction between the vanquished and the victor consisted in the laws by which each was affected. Everywhere the barbarians lived under their own laws, and left the Roman law to the despised Romans. That the several codes compiled after their settlement in the subjugated provinces were translated into Latin, proves nothing more than their willingness to communicate them to the conquered, who were interested in many of the enactments then introduced. The Anglo-Saxons, on taking possession of Britain, composed their laws in their own language, without troubling themselves with an inquiry whether they would be understood by the Aborigines or the few Romans who might remain. But a remarkable consideration is called forth by the Latin codes, and that is the utter outrage on a Frank, he was fined 1200*d.* (Tit. 35, n. 3 & 4. See other examples under tit. 15, n. 3 & 4, tit. 43, n. 1, 6, 7 & 8.). Theodoric, in 526, prescribing the mode of swearing fealty to the king, seems to make no distinction between the two classes of his subjects, for he directs the Romans to make the oath to the Goths, and the Goths to the Romans.—Epist. VII. ap. Bouquet, t. IV, p. 11.

* This is supposed to be the origin of the Spanish hidalgo, a gentleman by birth, which was anciently written fjodalgoda and fjodalgod. Hence there is a peculiar force in their proverb "El rey no puede hazer hidalgo,"—the king cannot make a hidalgo, which is entirely lost, if we believe with Pineda and others, that this word is hijo dälgo, the son of somebody. The Spaniards have a class of gentlemen whom they call by a name, which like the proverb, strongly enforces the derivation from hijodalgoda, the son of a Goth. It is the hidalgos de avengär quinientos sueldos, or gentlemen who might claim a fine of 500*s.* for a wrong done by another; whereas one who was not a hidalgo could claim only 300*s.* As to the explanation of hidalgo, as a son of somebody, which is anybody, it does not correspond with the manner in which terms of honor were formed by ancient people.

† Ll. Wisigothorum.

CHAP.
IV.Forensic terms of the barbarisms Latinized.

inadequacy of the language to express the titles of the conquerors and the terms of their laws and customs. In every page this incurable defect is conspicuous. Not only are Latin words superseded by barbarisms in cases in which they might have answered tolerably well, if there had been any desire to employ Latin, but even the most ordinary classical words are rejected in the same manner. Thus we find baro and barus instead of homo and vir. The body of the Law alone is Latin, while everything of real value, and constituting, as it were, the soul of the ordinance, preserves its barbarous appellation. A man of noble lineage is no longer a patricius, but an adelingus; the follower of a patronus is not his cliens or famulus, but his vasallus, and the patronus himself is a dominus with a new sense attached to his title. Their lands, utensils, arms, houses and furniture, though much the same as those of the Romans, have no Latin names; but if taken collectively they should be called their facultates or their bona, the meaning is not clear without the addition of et catalla :* and if a barus receive injury from another, he is to appeal, not as one might expect, to the judex, but to the grafio or gravio. Verbs expressive of highly criminal acts are treated with

* Catalla is of frequent occurrence in English law, in the translated form of chattels, of which both the etymology and signification are misunderstood. Blackstone, for instance, says that the word "primarily signified only beasts of husbandry or (as we still call them) cattle, but in its secondary sense was applied to all moveables in general."—Comm. II, 385. In Gothic katala is a pot or kettle; in Germ. kessel, Icelandic ketill, A.-Sax. cetel, cytel (whence kettle), and corrupted into ceatel, it produced chattels, the moveable property of a person. The Sanskrit ghatah, a water jar, is probably the original of these words, as well as of the Norman cateux. A skin for water, and a few kettles for cooking, constituted the domestic furniture of a Sakasen chief moving by desultory marches to the regions, whence his descendants issued to overthrow the greatest empire in the world. We can easily conceive the judicial graff pronouncing the decree of his court to confiscate the faih and *katala*s, or beasts and pots of a delinquent, and thus understand how, upon faih becoming appropriated to denote money, *katala*s came to mean both cattle and moveable goods.

like neglect, and necare, occidere or interfiere is usually expressed by murdrare or mortrare. The Latin having no word equivalent to the feudal truth, which implies radically anything fixed, established and certain, they sometimes represented it by firmitas, but more usually by trustis: and even in the ninth century we meet with firmitatem facere, as synonymous with fidem dare, both meaning to plight troth. These finally settled into the barbarous homagium facere, which is not precisely the same thing, though it includes the plighting. And with respect to the feudal munus and beneficium, which occur in the Formulæ of Marculfus, about the year 600, for lands held by military service, they were both displaced by the Indo-Teutonic feod-um. In short, the laws of the Gothic conquerors are dressed in a style sui generis, consisting of foreign words with Latin terminations, and of foreign idioms inadequately expressed in the language of Rome.*

The Salic code, in one series of its enactments, presents

* Almost as soon as the barbarians began to use the Latin for public purposes, the beneficial work of corruption commenced, through the necessity of employing their own terms in their simple laws, and those terms being better understood, were, on that account, more impressive than the corresponding Latin. Childebert, in a decree issued in 532, writes “cum leudis nostris” for subditis fidelibus; and “jaceat forbattutus,” to denote that one of two combatants shall be deemed the aggressor, literally the first beater or striker. The 6th section is conceived in terms not the most intelligible to his Roman subjects: “De forfaliis ita convenit, ut quicumque in mallo præsumpserit farfalium minare, sine dubio suum widrigildum componat, &c.”—Baluz. Capit. t. 1, p. 17. In Marculf’s Formulæ, “per fortiam” denotes per vim (For. 28.), and we read tultis for ablatis, adsallire for adoriri, livorare for vulnerare, &c. The laws of the Burgundians and Visigoths are tolerably free from barbarous words; but those of the Salians and Ripuarians abound in them; for instance, the Salic Law Tit. 6, de Herburgium, n. 1, runs thus: “Si quis alterum chervioburgum, hoc est strioportium, clamaverit, aut illum qui inium dicitur portasse ubi strias cocinant:” and in the Ripuarian code, a sword is a spata; its scabbard, a scogilus; a strong coat of mail is a brunia bona; a hawk, a gruarius; a hole, a traugus; a spinning wheel, a conucula, &c.—Tit. 36, n. 11, t. 43, t. 68, n. 18, and Tit. 87, “De homine forbannito.”

CHAP.
IV.Beneficiary Estates.

a formidable objection to the opinion that Roman laws or customs had any share in the composition of feodality. In regulating the descent of hereditary land, the alodial or that which belonged to the Romans, is allowed to pass into female descendants in default of male, a preference being given to the next of kin on the paternal side; but Salic land could not be inherited by a woman. The reason of the difference is obviously the existence and operation of feods at this time: the Franks who lived under Salic law only, were alone permitted to serve the state, and the only tribute they rendered for their possessions was their arms and bodies in defensive war. The Romans on the contrary, discharged the tenure of their lands by paying taxes, which could be done as well by women as men. In process of time, when these two classes became assimilated in manners and language, and intermarriages had taken place, the alodarii began to convey their estates to the sovereign in order to take them again on the conditions of feudal tenure.*

Mr. Sullivan, in noticing the change of beneficiary estates into inheritances in France, briefly describes what took place in that kingdom with respect to the admission of the conquered to an equality with the Franks: "What greatly contributed," says this learned writer, "to the extending of these grants to indefinite generations was the inclination that now seized the Romans and Gauls, who held allodial lands, to be admitted into the feudal policy by becoming vassals to the king. They had long lain under very humiliating distinctions. They were no members of the state.

* We find Charlemagne adopting the distinction between his Roman and other subjects: "Romani successiones juxta illorum legem habeant, similiter et omnes scriptiones secundum legem suam faciant, et quando jurant, juxta legem suam jurent. Et alii similiter faciant. (That is, other people shall do likewise, according to their respective laws.) Et quando componunt, juxta legem ipsius cujus malum fecerint, componant: et Longobardos illos convenit similiter componere. De cæteris vero causis communi lege vivant, quam dominus Carolus excellentissimus rex Francorum et Longobardorum in edictum adjunxit."—Ll. Longob. l. II, t. 56.

The loss of their lives and other injuries were compensated only by half the satisfaction to a Frank. For neglect or contumacy when called into the king's courts, they were reputed guilty, and forfeited their estates, whereas a Frank was only imprisoned to oblige him to answer. When accused of the lightest crimes, they were put to the ordeal, whereas the Franks were only subjected thereto in case of murder. And many others were the distinctions between the allodial and feudal tenants. No wonder then the former were very desirous of enrolling themselves among the conquerors, which, when they at length obtained their liberty, was effected by giving their allodial lands or a part of them to the king, and receiving them back subject to the feudal rules. Now were they immediate vassals of the king, and as such became Franks to all intents and purposes. But this people was not so foolish, nor could it be expected of them, to part with absolute inheritance, and take back only an estate for life. They insisted upon grants for a perpetuity, at least for as long as the issue male of the person receiving lasted. When once these donations became common, the Franks were very ready to follow the example, and to take all advantages either of the favour or the weakness of the king, and to such a number did these inheritances increase, that about the year 730 the kingdom was near being lost to the Saracens for want of a sufficient number of beneficiary or life estates to encourage the soldiery.*

Although the power of the king was now and for long afterwards merely nominal, the maxim might very well begin to be adopted, that he, the representative of the state, was the owner of the soil. The phrase "tenere in alodio," in the early writers, refers to a time when there were many proprietors, whose transition into feodatories gave rise to the maxim, "nulla terra sine domino," in like manner

* Hist. Feudal Law, p. 112.

CHAP.
IV.

seems to confirm the establishment of the former maxim. It would be at this time that the term beneficium was changed to feodum.*

*Rise of the Feodal
Law.*

Military service, and not the possession of the soil by a prince, was the fundamental condition of all feudal donations. Whether the state or an individual were the grantor the reciprocal duties were the same. At first they were simple, but after the conversion of alodial territory into fiefs they became complex, and gave rise to the collection of customs and usages called the Feodal Law. "As to the law and practice of feuds, when they became inheritances," says Sullivan, "there can be little doubt it was owing to the Franks; for the books of the feudal law written in Lombardy, acknowledge that the emperor Conrad, who lived about 1024, was the first that allowed fiefs to be descendable in Germany and Italy; whereas the kingdom of the Lombards was destroyed by Charlemagne above 200 years before; and he it was who first established among his own Franks the succession of fiefs, limiting it indeed to one descent. His successor continued the same practice, and by slow degrees this right of succession was extended, so that by the time of Conrad, all the fiefs in France, great and small, went in course of descent, by the concession of Hugh Capet, who made use of that device in order to sweeten his usurpation, and render it less disagreeable. (Esprit des Loix, l. 31, c. 31.) By that concession he, indeed, established his family on the throne, but so much weakened the power of the crown, that it cost much trouble, and the labour of several centuries, to regain the ground then lost."†

If the conquerors everywhere set aside the Roman laws, institutions and customs in favour of their own; if they held the vanquished in profound contempt, denied them

* See pp. 66, & 76.

† Feod. Law, p. 23.

civil rights, and discouraged the use of their language,* and if everywhere they established those characteristic institutions which exercise powerful influence at the present moment, it will be difficult to believe that the feudal polity, brought with their ancestors from Asia, and for centuries forgotten by the Romans, was the only exception, and owed its rise to the grants of Roman emperors, or the statutes of the Roman senate.

CHAP.
IV.

* The antipathy to the people and language is visible in a decree of the emperor Frederic Barbarossa some centuries afterwards, by which he directs the confiscation of the property of a German soldier who should associate with one of Roman race, unless the latter spoke German. It is preserved by Gunter:—

Miles Teutonicus socium de gente Latina

Non habeat, nisi noticiam sermonis habentem

Teutonici: quod si præsumpserit, omnia perdat.

Ligurin. l. VII, Reuber. Script. Germ. p. 385.

CHAPTER V.

The principal terms in the Feodal Law result from the nature of the moral bond between the chief and his followers. Homage and fealty; Oaths of allegiance; and Duties of Vassals.

- 1.—Feodal institutions traceable in Scandinavia. 2.—Frequent allusions to them in ancient compositions of the Northern and Germanic nations; the military companions of the Germans are the same as the Sanskrit sithis. 3.—Instances of feodal usages: Pit and Gallows. 4.—Treason and cowardice. 5.—Ancient oath of fealty. 6.—Ambacti, ambatscia, and ambassador. 7.—Oaths of allegiance,—a Saxon, Frank, Norman; Modern allegiance not founded on Gothic constitutions: Wapentake, View of Frankpledge, Hundred Court. 8.—Troth, truage; Drost, a governor; Gograff, antrustio, druerie. 9.—War-leader, army leader, various names of; War shield, and custom of summoning followers; the bell-house of the Saxons, tincl da rois, &c.: herberge, heristall, stations of the tribe or army. 10.—Land substituted for food or military rations; the northern veisla, a banquet answered to foedum, and the Rajpoot putta. 11.—The veisluman, or vassal. 12.—Len, lehn, &c. answering to loan; names of fiefs. 13.—Lords of such loans. 14.—Bonds or land owners. 15.—Derivations of allodium. 16.—Udell succession, Fowd of Zetland. 16.—Power of the aldoras.

CHAP.
V.

*Feodal
usages in Scandina-
via.*

1. The evidence that the feodal system existed in Scandinavia from ages more remote than the destruction of the Roman empire, is more particular than is to be found to support that of the Teutonic system; for in addition to the same kind of reasons, which so satisfactorily establish the latter, we have the direct testimony of the literary compositions of the north, both historical and ornamental or fabulous. In this part of the world "Roman foot never trod," and both Roman laws and language were equally unknown. The conquerors of the world were not voluntarily acquainted with those hardy warriors, who frequently carried fire and sword into their richest provinces, and returned laden with the wealth which they found accumulated from every quarter of the earth but the frozen regions of the north.

2. The literary remains of the Germans and Anglo-Saxons have not a higher antiquity than the seventh century; the Gothic fragments of Ulphilas, of the fourth century, are of little assistance in historical research; and it may be doubted whether the Norse or Icelandic compositions, which are ascribed to an earlier period than the two first, are really any older. They possess this advantage however, that many of them are of an historical nature. The Heims Kringla, or Chronicle of Scandinavian kings, compiled in the twelfth century, are professedly deduced from very ancient ballads of the kind that Tacitus notices among the Germans. Many of these historical poems, from which numerous extracts are preserved in the compilation, may be safely referred to a date not later than the fourth or fifth century. This is also the period, in which Mr. Kemble reasonably supposes the Anglo-Saxon poem of Beowulf received its original form. Of the Sagas destitute of the character of history, and occupied with mythological adventures, it is unnecessary to conjecture the age. Like Beowulf, notwithstanding their fabulous contexture, they are valuable auxiliaries in the recovery of forgotten truth, and records of manners and usages of which no other traces exist.

*Feodal
customs occurring in the ancient writings of Scandinavia and Germany.*

More or less, these productions of both classes, abound in incidents, allusions and terms, which agree with what is said of the Germans by Tacitus, and leave no room for doubt, that although the people are not the same, they have sprung from the same stock. The want of records of Scandinavia and Germany, coeval with the production of the Roman historian, though it may be regretted in some departments of literature, is not of extreme importance in the present inquiry. When we find manners,

CHAP.
V.

Knights, Youths, or juvenes.

customs, and laws, of which vestiges yet remain, closely described, we can scarcely doubt that the terms, by which they are mentioned in the oldest compositions of the people by whom they were practised, are the same that were employed when Tacitus wrote. And when he names or describes particular orders of men, there is equal reason to believe that we still possess the terms that were used to designate them. For instance, he informs us that a composition for homicide was paid by the slayer to the family of the slain,* and we find this very composition known to the ancient laws of all the German nations, north or south of the Baltic, by a singular and expressive appellation.† He tells us that the people were divided into hundreds, and hundreds are still existing under that precise denomination; that the chiefs were surrounded by a troop of youths selected as the flower of the hundreds, to constitute at once their glory and their defence; and a very ancient order of nobility is still existing, whose members are styled youths, for such is the meaning of the old German knechten, and the modern English knights.‡ They are otherwise termed

* De Mor. G. 28.

† The ættarbot of the Northmen, was the same as the leodgild of the Anglo Saxons, and the custom was brought by them from Asia, where it still subsists, according to Col. Tod, who does not give the name. Ættar, in Icelandic, is relationship, and bot, a compensation; ætte, Alamannic; and atta, Gothic, a father, convey the idea of the word. The ættarbot was the composition paid to the family in satisfaction for the slaying of their relation. The leodgild, where leod, people, appears restricted to tribe, was the sum paid to the nation; and the wergild, common to the Saxons and Germans, was the sum or price paid for the man. It was proportioned to his rank, and was therefore his price or value. I here quotes from Palthenius, a passage in an ancient Pomeranian Chronicle, relative to the ættarbot, or family composition, among the Rugians: "Wer einen erwurgt der hat erzliche ochsen zur busse gegeben, und solche söhne hat nicht der negste blut, sondern die ganze hitzche oder freundschaft genommen." Whoever killed another gave a number of oxen to make boot or compensation, and this fine the next of blood does not receive, but the whole family or kindred. —Not. ad Tat. p. 311.

‡ The very "juvenes" of the Roman historian are noticed by Ammianus

riders or cavaliers, that is horse-men, and the service of those youths on horseback is particularly noticed by the Roman historian. "There was a great emulation," says Dr. Brady, summarily combining the accounts of the Germans by Cæsar and Tacitus, "among the Comites, who should be the favorites, and among the princes who should have the most and strongest. This was their honour, this their strength, to be encircled with a multitude of young men, an ornament in peace, a guard in war; yet none might take arms before he was approved by the nation. Then in the very assembly or council of the princes, either his father or his kindred adorned him with a sword and spear. This was the first honor of their youth: before they were merely a part of the family, now of the commonwealth: high nobility and the great merit of their fathers, gave their sons, though young, the titles of princes: it was dishonorable for the prince to be overcome, and dishonorable for his followers not to equal his courage: they were infamous ever after, that returned alive from the battle where their princes were slain, it being the chiefest part of their oath to preserve, defend, and make him glorious. They received from him a horse fit for war and a bloody and conquering spear: the reward for their services was meat and drink, and large, though rude, entertainment instead of pay or stipend. And when from the prince's munificence they received a boon, it was of things obtained by war and rapine. Theft, not being infamous out of their own nation, was allowed for the exercise and exciting the courage of their youths, for without that a numerous train of followers could not be maintained. The princes, as an honorary and for their sustentation, received for every man of the nation a quantity of cattle and corn, and from the Marcellinus among the Burgundians, whom he describes as 'brave, warlike, and almost invincible by their courageous and numerous youths.'—L. xxviii. c. 5. The Burgundians would not call them juvenes, but knechten, knights.

CHAP.
V.

neighbouring nations choice horses, arms and furniture. Here seems to be the beginning of fees and feudal tenures or benefices; here is a necessitude between the prince and his comites or followers, and a mutual obligation; they swore to defend him; he arms, feeds, and supports them; yet they were little more than mere comites according to the notation of the word cum and eo, and it became a title of dignity from their accompanying the general in war.* These comites were all horsemen chosen out of the noble and best sort of people, a hundred out of every pagus, and he who commanded them was called hundredarius or centurio.”†

Instances of feudal usages.

3. Each of the foregoing particulars, and, indeed, by far the greater part of the circumstances noticed by Tacitus, might be amply confirmed from subsequent authors of Germany, north and south of the Baltic. One example will sufficiently answer for the present, and show the use of which mere romance may be made in tracing the extent of manners and customs. In the Saga of king Half and his Warriors, Hiorleif, a Norwegian prince, having a heavy charge to prefer against his queen, laid it before the general assembly of his people, by whom she was tried and condemned to death. This is exactly the process which we are told obtained among the Germans in capital crimes.‡

* The origin of the corresponding title in the Germanic languages was traced, in p. 81, to the Sanskrit sithi, a disciple, from the verbal root shidh, go, move, travel. It may be here remarked that the collective particle, ge, A.-Sax., gi Old German, and ga Gothic, is the Sanskrit copulative conjunction cha, which radically signifies to collect. The Latin comites, answering to gesidhas, gesindon, is equally Sanskrit, though belonging to a different root. Cha is the Gr. kai, and the Latin enclitive particle que, and; it is also the co, col, com, con, and cum of the Latin, the final consonant being no more than a euphonious addition, changed or rejected according to the sound to which it is joined.

† Hist. of England, p. 56, s. 8. It should be observed that centurio is classical, and hundredarius, low Latin. The Goths called this officer hundafadhs, the Germans hunno, and the Saxons hundredes ealdor.

‡ De Mor. Germ. 12.

The assembly prescribed drowning or suffocation in a bog as the mode of punishment, but the prince interposed and saved her life.* Tacitus expressly mentions the practice which prevailed among the Germans, of suffocating such as were unfit for war by plunging them into a lake.† By a law of the Burgundians, women who forsook their lawful husbands were smothered in mud.‡ The Anglo Saxons brought this mode of punishment into England, where it was long known by the terms Pytte and Gallows,§ to denote the drowning of female and hanging of male offenders. Spelman has transcribed a curious record of the drowning of a woman at Croydon, in the reign of Richard I.;|| and in every page of the Placita de Quo Warranto may be found the claim to have a pit and gallows, which Coke says, were privileges exercised by lords of manors.¶

Pit and Gallows.

The royal prerogative of extending mercy to criminals is not mentioned by the Roman observer of German customs, but there can be no doubt that it was possessed by these early monarchs, and exercised as stated in this fabulous story of king Hiorleif. Respecting the disgrace of returning home after the defeat of a chief, the Sagas have numerous instances of his companions devoting themselves to death in preference to a life of dishonour. One of king Half's warriors declares before his own fall:—

Prerogative of mercy.

* 'Thad dæmde landsfolkid ad Æsa væri dreckt i myre, enn Hiorleifur kongur sendi hana uppa land med heimanfylgiu sina.' This adjudged the people, that Æsa should be drowded in a marsh, but the king sent her up the country with her retinue of domestics.—Saga Thattur af Alfe k. og Reckum hanns, c. 8.

† Palude mergunt.—De M. G. 28.

‡ Si qua mulier maritum suum cui legitime juncta est, dimiserit, necetur in luto.—Tit. 34 n.

§ "Furca et Fossa."

|| Two women, who had stolen a large quantity of cloth, at Croydon, entered Suffliet, pursued by the townsmen of the former place. They were tried by hot iron, (by ordeal), by which one was acquitted, but the other was convicted, and was thereupon drowned in the Bike Pool.—Gloss. p. 21.

¶ 1 Inst. III. 38.

CHAP.
V.

Hier mun Innsteirn til jardar hniga boskur ad hofdo hers odvita.
Thad mun segger ad sognum giora ad Halfur kongur hlæande do.

Here will Instein sink to the ground undismayed at the head of his lifeless chief.
This shall men
in stories record, that king Half while laughing died.

Treason & Cowardice.

4. In the ancient poem on the exploits of Beowulf, a mythic hero, the form of a denunciation of cowardice, and the high crime of hlaforðswic or treacherous desertion of a feudal chief, is preserved, and is no doubt of the most remote antiquity.* While the hero was engaged in a fatal combat with a fiery dragon, his companions, stricken with terror, deserted him, on which Wiglaf pronounced the following malediction:—

Nu sceal sinc thego and swyrd gifu eall edhel wyn eowrum cynne lufena liegean lond rihtes mot thære mæg burge monna æghwylc idel hweorfan sydhthan ædheingas feorran gefricgean fleam eowerne domleasan dæd deadh bidh sella eorla gehwylcum
thonne edwit lif.

Now shall the service of treasure,
and the gifts of swords,
all joy of paternal inheritance, all support
of all your kin depart;
every one of your family must go about deprived of his rights of citizenship;
when far and wide
the nobles shall learn your flight,
your dishonourable deed.
Death is better to every warrior than disgraced life.

Mr. Kemble remarks on this passage, that it is not improbable that the whole of the denunciation is a judicial formulæ: such we know early existed, and in a regular rhythmical measure: the classical reader need not be reminded of Aristotle's νομοι. Chlodovic seems to make use of a similar formulæ to his kinsman Ragnachari, who had suffered himself to be taken prisoner and bound. The anecdote, which Mr. Kemble quotes, is to the effect that Chlodovic addressing the delinquent, asked, "Why have you disgraced our family by suffering yourself to be bound? Were it not better for you to die?" Then raising his spear he slew him. Turning to his brother, he said, "If you had afforded succour, your brother would not have been bound;" and then killed him in like manner by piercing his head.* Tacitus says of the Germans, that 'to have left their shield behind is a mark of disgrace, nor is it lawful for a person so branded to be present at their religious rites, or to enter their assemblies, and many who have survived the battle, have terminated their infamy by the halter.'

* In the mature state of the feudal system, treachery and rebellion against a liege lord, were included in the term felonia, felony, which ought to be written fellonia, for a reason that will hereafter appear.

5. Nothing can be more explicit than the words of this writer in describing the nature of the bond and mutual obligation between the chief and his followers, when he states that the latter took an oath to defend him, and that the former, instead of rewarding his services with a stipend or certain pay, furnished him with food and entertainment, or as our work-people say, with wages in board and lodging, on a large but rude scale of liberality. Each of these circumstances being regular and customary, had its appropriate name, distinguished by its peculiar application from an ordinary word. A common epistle is, in English, what it ever was, a writ, but a writ is confined in use to lawyers, and a person may be a noble man without being a nobleman or allied to nobility. The companionship, the oath of fealty, the free quarters, the stipulated rations, and the duty and service reciprocated between the chief and his followers, were all designated in this manner without doubt before the Sakasenas left their native plains and hills in Asia, at a period beyond the reach of European history;

Ancient Oath of Fealty.

* See the valuable Note on Beowulf, 5763.

CHAP.
V.

*Ambacti, Ambascia,
and Ambassador.*

and they continued so designated while feudality existed as a systematic institution in Europe.

6. The companions of the chief, whom Tacitus calls comites, and explains to be youths on horseback, had been named by Cæsar ambacti.* That the youthful cavalry were knights, and so called by the natives themselves is more than probable, and that the term, though common to all young men,† was the distinctive appellation of a mounted soldier in close connection with the chief, is almost certain from this adoption of a Teutonic word by Cæsar in connection with a classical term denoting that connection. We call it Teutonic in the broadest sense, for it is common to all the cognate dialects spoken from the northern extremity of Sweden to the Danube, excepting the Slavonic. It is found, after Cæsar, in the Gospel of Ulphilas, andbahts, a ministering officer, and in one place it is used in contrast to skalks, a servant.‡ Probably the next form which it assumed is given in the Laws of Ethelbert, in 532, where ambiht smith, the superintendent of the royal armourers occurs,§ and in Beowulf:—

* Alterum genus est equitum. Ii, quum est usus, atque aliquod bellum incidit—omnes in bello versantur; atque eorum, ut quisque est genere copiisque amplissimus, ita plurimos circum se ambactos clientesque habet.—De B. G. VI, c. 15.

† Cniht, a boy, a youth, a servant, is the Anglo-Saxon form; kneht, the Old German, which Wachter says was the first knet, knit. The attempts to explain this word by derivation are numerous and erroneous. Knet appears to be etymologically the same as gnat-us, Lat. a son, a boy, one that is born. In Sanskrit, whence these terms have proceeded, distant kinsmen are called jnati, relationship is jnateya (from jan, to produce), but a band of kinsmen, bandhata, which would be correctly represented in Anglo-Saxon by bandhad, and in English by bondhood.

‡ “Stodhun skalkos jah andbahtos,”—the servants and officers were standing.—Joh. xviii, 18.

§ Ambt (now amt), an office or employment, which Wachter considers to be a contraction of ambaht or ambacht, is probably the Sanscrit amatya, a counsellor, minister; hence amtman, the governor of a castle, bailiff, &c. Professor Pott derives ambactus and Goth. andbahts, from Sanskrit bhadsh (bhaj), to serve.—Etymologische Forschung, sh. II, p. 47.

Tha he him of dyde
isern byrnan helm of hafelan
sealde his hyrsted sweord irena cyst ombiht thegne and gehealdan het hilde geatwe.

Then he did off him
his iron hauberk,
the helmet from his temple;*
he delivered his adorned sword,
of irons the choicest,
to the ministering thane, and bade him preserve the trappings of war.

L. 1335.

This is clearly a knight in attendance on the prince. In the same poem the warder of the sea coast is styled by this term:—

Thær on wicge sæt ombeht unforht.

There on his charger sate
the minister unfearing.

L. 570.

And even Beowulf, a prince, attributes the name to himself as the vassal of king Hrodhgar or Roger:—

Ic eom Hrodhgares
ar and ombiht.

I am Roger's
messenger and minister.

L. 669.

In the Rhythmic Chronicle, an ambachtman is represented as freely delivering his opinion to the emperor Frederick Barbarossa:—

Do sprak eyn sin ambracht man.
Then spoke one of his ministers.

C. 32. v. 58.

In the thirteenth century, ambacht was a general term for office.† From an edict of Magnus Ericson of Sweden,

* The original hafela, may mean the head; it is a cognate of the Greek kephale, Low Lat. capellum, Sanskrit kapala, the head. Capellum ferri or ferreum, is an iron cap, a chaplet.

† As appears from the same Chronicle, c. 58.

“Der kong sande vor sek hen
Den kentzeler unde de Dorsten sin
Unde de Ambacht lude an de stat,
Dar he sek hen bereidet hat.”

The king sent down before him
His chancellor and his trusty commanders,
And the official people in the city, &c.

Dorsten should be Drosten.

CHAP.
V.

Ambascia, Ambassador.

*Man, a
vassal.*

issued in 1344, when he was about to depart from Norway, the form appears to have been aombetsman, corresponding nearly to the Anglo-Saxon ombeht, and denoting a viceroy.* The Icelandic Sagas, however, apply the word to slaves,† but on what account is not very clear, unless we conceive, that in consequence of the original sense of the word, one that obeys a command, it became degraded in the Norse. Anbyht scealcas, in the poetical fragment of Judith, are ministers, or servants in command over servants. Cæsar's ambacti are unquestionably officers, and are described as clientes, from their personal attendance on the chief. They were a guard of horsemen having command over others, as was the case with the knights a few centuries later. It may be remarked that ambascia, in the Salic Laws, a word of the same origin, is used for service, and is manifestly the original of embassy and ambassador.

The ambact knights were bound to their lord by a particular oath,‡ to which allusions as well as direct mention by name, are of frequent occurrence. Asmund, king of Hordaland, in Norway, takes the oath of fealty and becomes the vassal of king Halfur,§ and it is observable that the word employed to denote a vassal, signifies a man. The feudalists have transferred this signification to the

* 'Waar aombetsman skal war aarliken ingield uppbæra, litin ok myekin, han ok thri af wart raadhi lagsaghu hwarie, mædhan wi af landit fara, skulu warn dom hafwa.' Our revenues, large and small, shall be delivered to our minister, who, with three of our council, while we are sojourning out of the land, shall have our judgment, i. e. administer the government.—Ihre, in v. Æmbete.

† 'Vard han tha miog reydhur, er Hlodhr skilldhi ambättar son heita.' Then was king Humli highly exasperated that Lodi should be called 'son of a female slave.'—Hervarar Saga, c. 18, fo. 14, b. Addit. MSS. 11, 108.

‡ Principem defendere, tueri, sua quoque fortia facta gloriæ ejus ad signare, præcipuum sacramentum est.—Tacit. M. G. 14.

§ 'Enn er Halfur kongur kom til Hordalands, tha var Asmundur kongur a fund hanns og giordest hanns madur og sor honum eyda.' When king Half came to Hordaland, king Asmund meeting him became his man and swore the oaths.—Sagann af Halfe k. c. 11.

Latin homo, the French ome and home, and the English man,* which though etymologically denoting a reasoning animal,† was used emphatically for a warrior. From the relation created by this oath between the chieftain and his plighted follower, sprang a most significant term, manskap, as it survives in Swedish, or manschap, in Dutch, which the feudalists imitated in coining the words hominium and homagium. Another Teutonic word, meaning man in the sense of a warrior, was introduced by the Longobards to the north of Europe, where it eventually became a title of nobility or honour, baron; while man with the addition of good, after long maintaining an equality with knight, finally sank into a very homely, though by no means disrespectful appellation.

CHAP.
V.

Home, Homage.

Baron, a Man.

Good-man.

* Rymer, t. I. and II. passim. Philip le Bel, in a mission to Edward II. of England, calls him his "home," in respect of lands in France (Trivet, Chron. ap. D'Achery, Spicil. t. VIII. p. 666), which appellation the latter endeavours to disclaim by his ambassadors:—

For whilom thou wrote him tille, and calde him in thi brese, Thy kynde, faythfull and leale
of Gascoyn noble duke, Therto thou set thi seale,
that right wilt thou rebuke,
Never sithen hiderward
Suilk speche unto him touched, Werfore our kyng Edward in thouht full well has souched, Thou holdes him not thi man,
no thing holdand of the,
Ne the thinkes never forthan,
to mak the more feaute,
Ne hopes to wyne that land with dynt of dougty knyght,
Of God he claymes holdand,
and never of no right."

Robert of Brunne, p. 258.

† It is the Sanskrit manava, having reason, i. e. a man, from the root, man, to think. Tacitus says that the Germans derived their descent from Mann.--De Mor. c. 2.

CHAP.
V.Ancient forms of swearing allegiance.

7. The feudal oath of allegiance among the northern warriors was called the trunadar eidr, literally the oath of fidelity, and therefore corresponding with the Southern oath of fealty, which is a corruption of fidelity, in the same manner as leal is from loyal, O. French loyalte, Spanish lealtad, from Latin fidelitas. All the Germanic nations swore the oath upon their weapons. Ammianus mentions this custom among the Quadi,* whose Asiatic origin is testified by their name, which is the Sanskrit Vyadhas, hunters, whence the O. Norse veidi, hunting, the Sanskrit V being always changed by the Romans to Qv. The Danes, the Swedes, and the Baiwari, swore with their swords drawn, and the phrase among the old Saxons, "to swear with the armed hand," refers to the same custom among themselves. The Alamanni swore upon a drawn sword; so did the Bulgarians; and the tribes at the foot of the Pyrenees swore upon two spears crossed saltierwise.

Scandinavian Oath.

We have the full import of the Scandinavian oath in the story of Hervor, where the technical trunadar eidr is opposed to the swardægi or ordinary oath: "King Heidrek addressing his men," says the skald, "required oaths from them all, in order to secure their oaths of fealty; and none daring to refuse, they all swore their oaths to render him warlike aid as well without as within the land.† The expression to become the man of a superior, to which was often added, and be true friend, equivalent to the more recent phrase, loyal and faithful friend or leal et feal amy, is of very frequent occurrence in these compositions, and always implies the bond of union between the lord and vassal.

True
friend.

* Eductis mucronibus, quos pro numinibus colunt, juravere se permanenturos in fide.—Hist. l. xvii. p. 107.

† Tha taladhi Heidrekr kongr til sinna manna, ok beiddist af theim ollum suardaga, at vinna sier trunadar eida. Enn thui kunni eingenn neita, ok soru aller menn honum tha eida, at veita honum lidh, bædi vtan lands ok innann.—Hervarar S. c. 11. fo. 9 b.

The necessity of extending mutual assistance in an age of universal murder and rapine, is the origin of Gothic allegiance and the foundation of its maxims. If the poor and the weak sought protection from the rich and the strong, the latter was obliged to rely upon them for the defence of his possessions. Every man capable of aiding in warlike business, was a free agent, and could not be commanded without his own consent. The powerful, therefore, engaged the continual assistance of the poorer freemen, and retained them in his immediate vicinity by allotting them portions of his own land, as their alimony and the recompense of their military services; or where there was no land to bestow, he maintained them in the manner described by Tacitus. Hence resulted the oath of fealty and the oath of obedience (hyld ath,) which the person engaging to defend a superior, swore upon his spear or sword held across that of his lord, who holding it forth for the purpose, thus plighted himself to observe the conditions of the sworn engagement. These conditions were reciprocal: the superior engaged to protect and maintain the vassal; the latter vowed to defend the superior so long as he observed that engagement. This was the "allegiance, the tie, or ligamen," to use the words of Judge Blackstone, "which bound the subject to the king, in return for that protection which the king affords the subject."* If either failed in the engagement, the contract was voided, the allegiance was at an end, and he of the two that first broke his faith, was thenceforth a fellon to the other, that is, as explained by the etymology of this term, they were as enemies and in a state of war with each other. This is the reason that the old feudal law treats of felonies committed by the lord against the vassal, as well as the contrary. The Anglo Saxon oath explicitly names each particular just recounted; the contract before taking the oath, the promise allegiance.*

*Gothic

Felony.

* Comm. I. 366.

CHAP.
V.

to defend the chief, the engagement of the latter to defend the vassal, and the voidance of the allegiance on failure to observe the conditions of the contract:—

*A.-Saxon
Hyldath or Oath of fealty and homage.*

“On thone drihten the thæs haligdom is fore halig. ic wille beon N. hold and getriwe, and eal lufian thæt he lufiath, and eal ascunian thæt he ascunath, æfter godes rihte, and æfter woroldgerysnum, and næfre willes ne gewealdes. wordes ne weorces. owiht don thæs him lathre bith with tham the he me healde swa ic earnian wille. and ealle thæt læste thæt uncer FORMÆL wæs thæs thu to him gebeah. and his willan geceas.”*

“By the Lord before whom this shrine is holy, I will be faithful and true to N. and love all that he loves, and shun all that he shuns, according to divine justice and worldly principles, and never of my will or power, word or work, do aught that may be hurtful to him, on the condition that he protect me as I shall deserve and fulfil, which our pre-contract was when I submitted to him and chose his will.”

In the terms of this oath, a voluntary submission to the will of a chief, on the one hand, and a promise of protection on the other, are clearly expressed. The formæl, fore-speech, is the previous compact, of which the oath was the ratification. He that took it was in a state of manred manhood, manschap, manskap, or homage;† and he that

* Gloss. ad X Scriptores, v. Fidelis.

† For manred, see p. 46 & 56, n. Manræd occurs in the Saxon Chronicle; manskap in an old Swedish history of Alexander, quoted by Ihre:

“Swa raodis the fore hans wrede
the toko manskap alle i sänder.”

So rued they for his wrath they all took homage to his messenger.

It is often found in the public acts of Sweden, when the people promised the king elect, “huldschap, troskap och manskap,” goodwill, fealty and homage. In Dutch, “manschap doen,” answers literally to the English, “to do homage.” In Robert of Gloucester, the term is manhede. In Sanskrit, manya is obedience.

The following passage in the Glossary to the Ancient Laws and Institutions of England, relates to the Saxon Hold:

received the oath, owed hyldo or favour and protection to the hold or faithful vassal, and he was, in this point of view, denominated his gehyld or protector.* And it may be observed that the Franks employed very similar language in noticing these relations; thus in the famous ode on the victory of Ludwig over the Northmen, in July, 882, the gifts and favours of God are detailed in feudal phraseology:—

“ Holoda nam truhtin
Magaczogo warth er sin
Gab’ her ihne dugidi

“ O. N. hölldr. In its Norse acceptation this title is defined by Biorn Haldorsen, as dominus fundi aviti vel allodialis. The Index to the Gragas describes a holldr as colonus odalicus vel fundum aviti tenens. From the amount of his weregild, which is double that of a priest or thane, it is evident that he enjoyed a very high rank in the state. The title was most probably introduced by the Danes, and limited to East Anglia.”

Haldorsen and the Gragas explain it in its secondary acceptation. In ancient phraseology, to cover is to defend, and a protector is one that stands in the stead of an actual covering (pro tecto). Ge hyld in A.-Sax. is a protector. The word corresponding etymologically with hyld, fidelity, and hyldo, favour, protection, in Gothic is huldh-s, merciful, and it appears connected through the participle hulidh-s with huljan, to cover: and HULDh-s=CULT-us Latin, both from the Sanskrit chal, to cover. Cultus, in its sense of worship or reverence, probably refers to the ancient ceremony in adoration, of covering the head and face. Hyld-adh is literally the oath of fealty, and while hold, hölldr, is the person taking the oath, ge-hyld is his protector. All the circumstances of feodality, that is, military service, land for aliment as wages, and assurance of protection, are enumerated in the following passage from Beowulf:—

Ofer madhmum sealde	Besides the treasures, he gave
hiora gehwædhrum	to each of them
hund thusenda	a hundred thousand
landes and locenra beaga	of land and locked rings,
ne dorfte him tha lean othwtan	nor needed any man upon earth
mon on middan gearde	to upbraid him with these rewards,
sydhthan hie tha mærdha geslogen	since they won their glory with blows;
and tha lofore forgeaf	and then to Jofer he gave angan dohter	his own daughter,
ham weorthunge	a dignity to his home,
hyldo to wedde.	as pledge of protection.

L. 5982.

* Manna gehyld.—Beowulf, l. 6107.

CHAP.
V.

Fronisc githigni,
Stuel hier in Vranken
So bruche her es lango."

*Staug. 2.

The Lord accepted him as his hold or vassal;
His kin-leader he became;
He gave him nobles (doughty ones)
Illustrious co-thegns, (counts,)
A stool (throne) here in Franconia,
Which may he long enjoy !

Frankish Oath.

It is observable also, that in the Saxon oath, fidelity is promised to N. only, and not to his heirs, nor indeed to him any longer than he acted as gehyld or protector. When Judge Blackstone says that the name and form of modern allegiance are derived to us from our Gothic ancestors,† we can allow no more than the oath to have been so derived, for it was an essential condition of the Gothic institution, that the lord or king should perform his own part of the contract, which as we have seen, was no more a legal fiction than the service which it engaged; and if he failed, he lost the homage or allegiance of his vassal. There was nothing derogatory to manhood or fatal to independence in the Saxon form; and that of the Franks under Charles the Bald, of which a copy is extant, of the date 854, was equally honourable. The vassal promises only to be faithful according to his knowledge, and as a Frank by right ought to be to his king.‡ But the Normans introduced into England the slavish or superstitious ceremony of kneeling before the lord, and taking the oath with the lord's hands clasped in his, together with an abject formula,

* Apud Langb. Script. Danic. t. II, p. 74. In a note upon Stanza, 17, he says "Dan. huld est fidelis, addictus, hinc hylde fidelitatem jurare, hylding, homagium huldskab og trotskab, fidelitas.

† Comm. I, 366.

‡ "Ego ill. Karolo Hludowici et Judithæ filio ab ista die in ante fidelis ero secundum meum savirum, sicut Francus homo per rectum esse debet suo regi. Si (sic?) me deus adjuvet et istæ reliquiæ!"—Capit. Caroli Calvi XIV, c. 13, published at Attigny, 854.

in which nothing is said of the pre-engagement and the obligations due to the vassal.

“Ceo oyez vous, N. bailife, que jeo, A. de ceo jour en avant serry feal et leal a nostre seigneur, E. roy d’Angleterre et a ses heires, et foy et lealte luy porteray de vie et de membre, et de terrain honour, et que jeo lour mal ne lour damage ne saverai ne orray, que jeo ne le defendray a mon poyer: si moy ayde dieu et ses seynts.”*

Anglo-Norman Oath.

“This hear, N. bailiff, that I, A. from this day forth, will be faithful and loyal to our lord, E. king of England, and to his heires, and bear faith and loyalty to him with life and limb, and terrene honour, and that I will neither know nor hear ill or damage to him, from which I will not defend him according to my power: so help me God and his saints!”

The Norman oath, as reported by Fleta, contains the pledge not to bear arms against the king, but is totally silent on the mutual obligation, which is the essence of the original feudal allegiance.†

The Gothic allegiance was reasonable and compatible with perfect freedom; it was merely the reciprocation of duties between the lord and vassal; it did not bind the latter to the feudal superior under all circumstances, nor could there be the least thought of the continuance of the engagement to the heirs of the chief after his death; for all offices of trust or command were elective.‡ These slavish and debasing principles were introduced into the Norman oath of fealty, which consequently subverted and abolished the main feature of the Gothic doctrine of allegiance. It is on Norman principles, and not Gothic, as Judge Blackstone imagines, that the modern doctrine of allegiance is founded.

* From Sir M. Hale, as quoted by Lord Lyttleton, Hist. v. IV, p. 30.

† “Hoc auditis, circumstantes, quod fidem regi portabo de vita et membris, et terrene honore, et arma contra eum non portabo: sic me deus, &c.” —Fleta, l. III, c. 16, s. 22.

‡ Tacit. de Mor. Ger. c. 7.

CHAP.
V.

The latter is immortal, although the prince were to fail in every duty to the subject, and to become a monster of inhumanity and perfidy, for, says the law, "it cannot be devested without the concurrent act of that prince to whom it was first due." This doctrine may be very convenient and agreeable to modern constitutions, but to ascribe it to the founders of the feudal system in Europe, who acted upon the opposite principle, is a remarkable error in that very learned and elegant writer.

Oath-
Swords.

There is another circumstance that ought to be mentioned, although it might be inferred from the custom of other Germanic tribes, that the Saxons before their conversion to christianity, swore the oath of fealty upon their swords:—

Thonne biOTH abrocene ath sweord eorla.

Then will be broken
the oath swords of warriors.

Beow. l. 4121.

Wapentake

From the term wapentachium in our old laws, and wapentake instead of the Hundred in several northern counties, we may infer that the people of the hundred acknowledged their allegiance to its chief, by touching his weapon with their own, and, it may have been, swearing their fealty, like the Bernese, upon swords or spears held crosswise: the word itself (wapna tac), the touching of weapons, implies as much. Under the very same name this custom, which appears to be truly Oriental in origin, existed among the Scandinavians: "Arni," says the historian, "ordered his people to perform the Wapnatak to this end, that they should adjudge by their laws Jarl Sigurd and his followers to be enemies."* Spelman's account of the wapentake among the Anglo-Saxons is, that all the males of the division came to the place where the centener or hundred-man had erected his spear, to touch it with theirs, as an acknowledge of his authority. This is an extremely probable conclusion; but he goes on to conjecture that the term was derived “a deditione armorum,” from laying down their arms before the lord of the hundred on his assuming the government, and that wapentake denoted his taking the weapons delivered by the inhabitants in token of subjection, “in subjectionis symbolum.” Whence, he adds, the whole assembly was called a wapentake, because on the first approach of a new lord, the tenants are bound to deliver their weapons in token of homage, “reddere sua arma pro homagio.”* The whole ceremony is obviously a relic of the custom of swearing to defend and guard the chief, mentioned by Tacitus,† who might not have learned the mode of taking the oath. The same custom seems to have prevailed among the first Romans, who were an aggregate of numerous tribes or parts of tribes from all quarters: the Gothic, German, and Old Prussian words found in such abundance in Latin, have led some to suppose that they were introduced by tribes from countries far beyond the Alps and Danube; but the Sanskrit structure of the language is sufficient to establish the Oriental origin of the people, and to supersede the necessity of resorting to this hypothesis. Among those early Romans, the spear was the ensign of the chief’s authority, and we may believe that like all their transalpine brethren, they swore their oaths of obedience upon this weapon, for we find in ages after the disappearance of the reges or chiefs in the government, and when all traces of feodality had long been covered by municipal institutions, there was a traditional memorial of this solemn use of the spear, but, as is often the case with antient customs of which the reason and nature have been forgotten, it was very absurd. The Romans now pretended that their forefathers worshipped spears instead of the immortal Gods,

* "Arni beiddi at men skuldo gera wapnatak at thui, at dæma med lagum Sigurd Jarl oc allum flock theirra til fiandans."—Heims Kringla t. II. p. 414.

* Glossar. p. 563.

† See p. 110, n. ‡.

CHAP.
V.
—Frank
Pledge.

Court Leet.

and that it was in commemoration of this superstition that spears were still added to the images of the Gods.* No doubt, the weapon having been used as the material or corporeal part of the oath, acquired a degree of sanctity, but as an addition to the statue of a deity it merely denoted his governing or presiding power, as it had formerly done that of the regal chief. The traditional worship of the spear seems to have been the custom of the wapentake performed to the patres in their respective centuriæ or hundreds. By another term the ceremony was called a View of Frank Pledge,—a court of which Blackstons says “Its original intent was to view the frank pledges, that is, the freemen within the liberty, who, according to the institution of the great Alfred, were all mutually bound for the good behaviour of each other.† More likely it was to view their spears. The term, View of Frank Pledge, appears to be very hybrid: franca, in Anglo-Saxon, is a spear; wæpn, any kind of arms, a weapon; and a “view of frank pledge,” a name superseding the original wapentak, seems to mean a view or survey of the francas, spears, brought in accordance with the ancient custom, by all who plighted their own obedience and became mutual pledges. As to translating frank, by freeman, it is altogether superfluous, for among the Saxons, a bearer of arms and a freeman were the same. When by reason of the number of inhabitants in the hundred it was no longer convenient to take the pledges by touching the francas or spears, the ceremony of producing them at the place of meeting, which was always performed in the open air, was called a view of the franks-pledgers. By another term the court of frank-pledge is called the court-leet, but apparently with little accuracy; for the court leet, as will be hereafter shewn, was the court of the leodes

* “Per ea adhuc tempora reges hastas pro diademate nam et ab origine rerum, pro diis immortalibus veteres hastas coluere: ob cujus religionis memoriam, adhuc deorum simulacris hastæ adduntur.”—Justin. xliii. c. 3.

† Comm. IV, 273.

or principal vassals of a gesidh, and constituting the court of the sidhesocn, whence they were called sidhesmen, the original of the present sidesman.

CHAP.
V.

8. The hold of the Saxons, in time, became a military officer, whose rank, according to his wergild, was equal to that of a high greve. In Scandinavia, the hollur vinur,* when the oath was given to the king, appears to have denoted a personal dignity, and king's-friend, in this sense, is found upon a Runic monument, discovered at Hoyby.† Such also were the German trustes and antrustiones, who bore the same rank as the amici of the emperor Tiberius,‡ the latter being obviously a feudal appellation adopted from freeman in a country of slaves. It seems indisputable that drost, the old German title of the governor of a gau, or territory, who was afterwards called a go-graff, is the legitimate parent of the barbarous Latin terms. Wachter, on an unintelligible principle of contraction, supposes drost to to have originally been drottsæt, the lord's seat; but drost and trost are only dialectic varieties, expressing the same idea, which is that of truth, firmness, stability. It is observable that truage, the cognate of these terms, denoted in old English a tribute in commutation of feudal service, and a token of fealty or acknowledgment of feudal superiority. Thus, Robert of Gloucester says, that Lud, the fabulous king of Britain:—

Troth, Truage, &c.

Antrustio.

Drost.

Gograff.

“Dude as alle other kynges dude, & ys rygt servage,
Dude to the hye emperour, & sende hym hys truage,

* The Earl Erling clenches a request to king St. Olaf for some fiefs in his gift, with the formulæ: “Man ec tha gerast thinn madhur oc hollur vinur.” I will be thy man and faithful friend.—Olafs hinns Helga Saga, c. 78.

† Kunungsvin Holi Thudr reisti kerf disi uftir kunung Gorm. The king's friend, Holi Tudi, engraved these marks (in honor of) king Gorm.—Ol. Worm. Mon. Dan. p. 206. The title is frequent in the Sagas, as also is that of kongsmen, kingsmen or courtiers, which it appears to denote in the Volsunga Saga, c. 35.

‡ Suprà. p. 83.

CHAP.
V.

And hys lond huld of hym, and dude hym homage,
Laste the hye emperour for his outrage Come and destruye al hys lond."

and of William I. he says, that he compelled the Welsh to bear him truage:—

Kyng Wyllam adaunted that fole of Walys,
And hem bere hym truage, & byhote hym & hys.*

The Sanskrit dhru, to be stedfast, whence dhriwa, certain, is equally the root of A.-S. treow, fealty, Engl. true, the Romance dru, loyal, and the O. Germ. drost, trost, or Low Lat. trustis, antrustio. Truth, therefore, is not exactly "what a man troweth," as Horne Tooke derives it, but what is fixed, established and certain. The Latin writers called a league or compact "firmitas," as the term of nearest import to the Frankish draw or drow; and with them "firmitatem facere" was the expression for engaging fealty before "fidem dare" was supposed to convey the meaning.† In Anglo-Saxon, "treow sculan," to owe fealty, occurs in a gnostic poem, which is extant in a MS. of the eleventh century:—

"Treow sceal on eorle."‡

Truage is a duty in an earl.

In the Roman de Florimond, quoted by Du Cange, "Bon ami et dru," is literally good friend and true; and elsewhere we have,—

"Le roy apela ses drus."

The king summoned his true men.

In like manner druerie, in the same language, corresponds in etymology and import with feudal truth, trowage and truage. Never was a knight in Britain, says Wace, of whatever condition he might be, who could ever be allowed his druerie, or kind lady for his mistress, if he had not been thrice proven in chivalry:—

* Chron. p. 46 and p. 372.

† Capit. Car. Calvi, xxxiv, c. 1, Anno 857.

‡ Cott. MS. Tiberius, B. I. fo. 113.

“Ja nul chevalier ni eust,
De que quel parage il fust,
Ja peust avoir druerie,
Ne corteise dame a amicee,
Se il neust trois fois este De chevalerie prove.*

This truth or truage was what is now termed allegiance, but unlike the latter, it was a bond which might be severed by the failure of the sovereign to observe its covenants. So far from the present doctrine having a claim to a foundation upon Gothic constitutions, it does not seem to have been universally acknowledged even in the fifteenth century: “I was true man to kyng Henry the iiij,” said a Trueman. bishop of Winchester, “all the time that he was my soveraigne lorde, and reigned upon me;”† clearly implying that he was true no longer than the king had power to compel his allegiance. And the feudal law itself is so explicit upon the subject, that it not only contemplates a felony by the lord against his vassal, but awards exactly the same penalty, the loss of the property of the fee, as for a felony committed by a vassal against his lord;‡ thus fully confirming the explanation of felony given above, that it was constructively a state of war, in which fellen was an enemy.

9. All the males, and often the women, in a German Army leader. community, were warriors, if able to bear arms, and hence the word harjis in Gothic, signifies a legion, a multitude, a host. In O. Germ. heri is an army, and in Anglo-Saxon, here is both an army of warriors and a troop of robbers. The reason is found in the etymology. The Sanskrit hara, war, is formed from the verbal root HRI, infinitive, harttum, to take by force, to rob, to ravish.§ Hara, which is also the

* Brut d'Angleterre, in Ellis' Specimens, vol. 1, p. 51.

† The iiij Yere of Kyng Henry the vj, fo. 29.

‡ “Si dominus commisit feloniam, per quam vasallus amitteret feudum, si eam commiseret in dominum, feudi proprietatem etiam dominus perdere debet.”—Feud. l. II, t. 26, 47. Blackstone, IV, 96.

§ So the grammatical example “Jihartti para narim dushtah,” the wicked man forces the wife of another.

- CHAP.
V.
— etymon of war, guerre, &c. is the original of the Gothic, German and Norse terms for an army, which also denoted a multitude. In Norse, according to Snorro, one hundred men were sufficient to constitute a her, or army; but fewer were required for the Anglo-Saxon here. Compounded with other words, this term produced in the different dialects, various military titles or designations; as herkongr, O. Norse, an army king; hertug, hertogi, Alamannic; herizoho, Frankish; hertug, Belgic; and heretoga, A.-Sax. an army leader, army duke, which the Romans, when they promoted their emperor to the supreme command of the state, imitated or translated dux belli, and exercitus dux.
Heretoga. Wherever the her halted on its march, the place was the heristall.* Upon the highest ground on this spot, the chief pitched his tent, which on that account was called Exercitus Dux. the hereberg.† Fixing his shield upon a bough of the nearest tree, he summoned his attendant knights, by striking it with his sword or spear, whenever he required their attendance at council, to serve forth their stipendiary rations, or to invite them to banquet with him. This usage continued to the thirteenth century, when Gunther described it as antient, but it was then accompanied by observances which are erroneously supposed to be of more recent origin Hereberg.
War shield.

* The heristall was the ground occupied by the whole army, and therefore enclosed the hereberg. Two places are so named from encampments of Charlemagne in 795, 797, and 798.

“ Nomen Heristalli dederat cui barbara lingua.”

Poet. Sax. de Vita C. M. c. 5.

Eigenhard, under the year 798, says: “ Novembrio mense mediante, ad hybernandum cum exercitu Saxoniam intravit, positisque castris apud Visoram fluvium, locum castrorum Heristalli vocari jussit.” (in Vita C. M.) Another Chronicler assigns the reason of the name, that the soldiers constructed their tents upon the spot: “ Rex Karolus—fecit sedem juxta locum, ubi Temella fluit in Wisaraha, quem etiam Heristelli appellavit, eo quod ex exercitu suo fuerant constructæ ipsæ mansiones, ubi habitabant.”—Chron. Moissiacens. An. 797.

† Herbergeria occurs in the household ordinances of Henry II.—Tit. Mariscallus, in Hearne's Liber Niger Scaccar.

than the time of Conrad the Salic, but which have all the appearance of being Asiatic :—

CHAP.
V.

“Pone castra solet; ligno suspenditur alte
Erecto clypeus: tunc præco regius omnes
Convocat a dominis feudalia jura tenentes
Excubias prima regi celebrare fideles
Nocte, vetustorum debent ex more parentum.
At quicumque domi, domino nolente, relictus Defuerit, feudo privari curia censet.”*

In the distant age which gave birth to the appellation of herberg, the defaulter lost only his dinner as the penalty of his absence; but his food in Gunther's time had become a substantial feod or fief. The memory of this herberg was preserved in several ways. It continued to the ninth century to be the name of a royal palace in Norway, where, from the reason assigned that there were then no halls erected in that kingdom,† it appears to have been a building of wood. It became the name of a lodging or place of entertainment, and a term of the feudal law, hereberga, arbergaria, alberga, to denote a right reserved by the lord, to repose in the house, and feast at the expense of his vassal, thus reversing the terms of the original institution. From this circumstance, herbergerie, in the English of Robert of Brunne, signified a habitation, and harbour, in the present day, a place of reception;‡ while the auberge of the French, is a house of entertainment.

Arberge.
Alberge.

* Ligurin. l. II. ap. Reuber, Script. Rerum Germ. p. 301.

† ‘Fer thesse ringur vida umm herbergi thar er menn drucku i, thvi tha varo ei hallir smidadar i thann tima i Noregi.’ The king Olaf Tryggvason carried this ring all round the berberg, where the company were drinking, for there were no halls built at that time in Norway.—Norna Gests Saga, c. 2. This strongly supports the opinion of those who connect haull, (f. gend.) a hall, a palace, with hallr, (n. g.) a stone; as if hall were any building of stone. Nevertheless, the permutations of the sibilant and aspirate through different dialects are too well established to admit of doubt; and as the Sanskrit sala is a hall, it may be presumed to be the original of hall, as well as of the Germ. saal, Fr. salon, and English soller.

‡ More curtaysli and more honowr
Fand he with tham in that towr,

CHAP.
V.Bellhouse.Tinel du Roy.Land substituted for food in payment of military service.

The Anglo-Saxons had a custom directly deduced from the dinner shield at the herberg of their nomadic ancestors. By the laws of the Mercians, enacted to regulate the ranks of society, it was absolutely required of a ceorl or farmer, that before he could be admitted to the rights of a thane, he should possess a certain quantity of land, a church, a kitchen, and a bell-house.* The reason of these requisitions is very apparent. The quality of the person was estimated by the number of his tenants, labourers and serfs. The wages of the two last were paid, as of yore, in board and lodging, and being numerous and occasionally dispersed over a large tract of land, the aspirant to thaneship was obliged to provide a bell to summon them to the kitchen or herbergerie. We have the representative of the shield and the Saxon bell-house, in the "tinel du roy," mentioned in the statute of Richard II. which prescribes the limits of the court held by the steward and marshall of the household, to be within the sound of the king's tinkler or palace bell. And such a thing as a dinner bell may be seen on any old or new manor house throughout the country.

10. It was food, which serf and warrior alike received in requital of service, but it was not universally denominated food by the Gothic or German tribes. To this circumstance it is partly owing, that no name of feudal land is found in any of the dialects derived from faudeins, föde, &c.; but they are greatly mistaken, who therefore argue, with Sir Francis Palgrave, that the Latin feodum is not a Gothic or Germanic derivative. The Anglo-Saxons called food, met, and though between met and meat or food there is a radical difference, yet the term knight's met-home, before noticed

And mare comforth bi mony falde
Than Colgrevice had him of talde.
That night was he herbered thar
So well was he never are.

Sir Ywain.

* Ll. Merr. c. 2.

as strictly equivalent to knight's feod or fee, is correctly appropriated to lands held in lieu of the original rations of food for services performed or to be performed. Food is that which feeds and fattens, while meat is the Sanskrit meda, the serum or juice of flesh, and is taken for the flesh itself. Beyond the Baltic, a different idea was formed of the remunerating diet supplied by the chief to his retainers: it was his gift or donation, and was named in orthographical variety, veitsla, veizla, and veisla, from the verb veita, to give, offer as a gift. The passages are innumerable in which this veit-sla occurs as a feast, banquet, or entertainment; but like the Saxon met, in met-hom, it acquired a peculiar meaning, as soon as the chiefs began to make conditional grants of land in lieu of their primitive pay in board and lodging. Now in Rajasthan, a fief is still denominated a putta,* and the holder of it, a puttawut,† which appears to be formed from the Sanskrit pati, a lord, as already mentioned. Apparently too, the verb veita, and its derivative veit-sla, are connected with this putta, which would account for the peculiar meaning of these words in their feudal application.

11. The obligation of a baron to his king, and the gifts bestowed upon him by the latter, are stated in Frithiof the Daring. Thorstein, says the writer of this ancient Saga, had the third part of the kingdom for his government, for which he rendered the greatest military aids to the king, and at great cost gave him an entertainment every third year; but the king entertained Thorstein every other year.‡ At these veit-slor or feasts, rent was paid (in

*The
veisluman or vassal.*

* Suprà, p. 72.

† "Every puttawut holding a separate putta from the presence, shall perform separate service. They shall not unite or serve under the greater puttawuts: and the sub vassals of all such chiefs shall remain with and serve their immediate puttawut."—Col. Tod's Rajasthan, v. I. app. xx. art. 7.

‡ Sagann af Fridthiofe Frækna, c. 1.

CHAP.
V.

kind) and homage performed, after which presents were made to the veit-slu-men or vassals,* who correspond to the puttawuts of central Asia. In Hervor, king Haufud, celebrated for his wisdom, cautions his son never to foster children for a man of higher rank than himself, nor of his own accord to accept his veisla;† the reason of which appears to be, that by so doing he would tacitly acknowledge himself to be a veisluman or vassal. Here, however, the word denotes only a feast or a gift, but it presently appears to be a feod or fief, as in the case of baron Thorstein.

*The len,
and lehn,
a fief.*

12. While the food, meat or veisla, consisted in edibles, and the rewards of bravery were of a more durable nature, as horses, swords, bracelets, which could be transferred, those terms answered the purposes to which they were applied, but when land was substituted, the grantee was bound by a particular tenure to the state or the chief, making it revertible on failure of the conditions of the sworn manskap or homage, and they became inadequate to express the want, which was now experienced, of a term to convey an idea of the revertible nature of the grant. Such a term was at length found in the old Norse læn and len, German lehn, which are all etymologically connected with the English loan; they are related words, derived in each language from a verb denoting to lend. Hence arose a term, having, in fact, the same import as veisluman or vassal; and in the north, one who held a len or fief of land was called lenadr madr, and lendir madr, both meaning a man possessed of a loan, lenadr and lendir being participial formations of len. Such as bore this title were equal to the English baron, at least

* 'Eptir veitslune för hvór heim med giöfum.' After the veisla every one went home with his gifts.—Sturlaugs Saga, c. 8, p. 18.

† At hann fostri alldrej sier gofugra manni barn, eda thiggia giarnan hans veitslu.—Hervarar Saga, c. 7. fo. 8. Addit. MSS. 11,108.

when this was the style of every lord of a manor.* And this is also the sense of the Saxon thegn or nobleman, for which William I. substituted the Norman baron. The former is derived from thigan, to take, receive, as the Old Norse thegn and degn, a subject, under the same idea of receiving maintenance from a chief, is derived from thiggia, the cognate of thigan. This ancient title may be in reality the same as the present (grasya) t'hacoor, or feudal lord of Rajasthan,† a title which means the consumer of a mouthful, if the Sanskrit dhakk, to destroy, consume, be the root. The common notion that thegn is derived from thegenian, to serve, proceeds from an imperfect knowledge of the internal construction of the language; for thegenian is to act like a thegn, and so to serve, if the thegn serve, as reafian is to act the robber, and as in Gothic smithjan, Icelandic smithia, is to act the smith or smiter. In Beowulf, thegn is conjoined with aldor; and aldorthegn is a chief of thegns. Among the Franks, githigni were as much as co-partakers.‡

Thegn.

Aldorthegn

13. The new name of the veisla produced a corresponding change in the title of the lord paramount, who became the lanardrottinn, of which, reserving the explanation of drottinn, a lord, it may be noticed that it occurs in Her-

Lords of such lens or loans.

* Snorro's table of comparative titles is curious:—

Enn i einu lande eru mörg land heröd og er thad hättur konga ad setia thar riettara yffer, svo mörg heröd sem hann gefur til wats (? valds.)

“Og heita their hersar eda lendermenn i Danske tungu, enn greyfar i Saxlandi, baronar a Eiglandi.”—Snorro's Edda.

(Oc er hersa i det Danske sprog (sem Edda) adelsmand, i Saxisk sprog en greffve, en Engelsk tuncmaal (tungemaal) en Frjherre.)—Note by Reisenius.

‘And in a country are many territories, and it is a custom of kings to appoint governors over them, to as many divisions as he gives for governments.’

‘And the governors are called hersar or lendermen in the Danish tongue, but counts in Saxony, and barons in England.’

(And the hersar is in this Danish speech, according to the Edda, a nobleman, in Saxon speech a count, and in the English language a baron.)

† Suprà p. 36, p. 46.

‡ Suprà, p. 116.

CHAP.
V.

vavar Saga, a composition of uncertain age, but with the exception of two or three explanatory interpolations and a genealogical appendix, anterior to the introduction of Christianity into Norway. It is also to be observed that this title of northern feodality is employed in connexion with the feudal crime of treachery to a lord, which has been mentioned under the Anglo-Saxon designation of hlafordswic.* The first advice of king Haufud to his son, is that he should never assist the vassal who has betrayed his loan-lord, or fee-lord.†

Bonds, or land owners.

14. From the statements of Cæsar and Tacitus it appears that those Germans whom they had an opportunity of observing, held the land in common, paid little attention to agriculture, and, like the Caucasian and some of the Cossack hordes of the present day, derived their subsistence from pasturage, and their luxuries from pillage. But in Scandinavia from the earliest immigration of these people, whether passing directly from Asia, or propelled by the pressure of subsequent adventurers and forced to relinquish their first settlements, the land was cultivated. There was a necessity for it; they could not rely solely upon spontaneous fertility; and even, notwithstanding their utmost exertions in after ages, they were subject to most horrible famines, to avert which they sacrificed their horses,

* Suprà, p. 106.

† At han hialpi alldrei theim manni, sem suikst hefr lanardrottinn sinn. —Addit. MS. 11,108, c. 8, fo. 8. In the edition of Olaf Verell, which differs considerably from this copy of the most poetical of the Sagas, drepid, slain, occurs for svikst, thus rendering the advice somewhat superfluous. King Head's intention is to impress upon his son the doctrine that he who is so unnatural as to betray his benefactor to whom he has sworn fealty, is worthy neither of trust nor assistance. To desert a lord in battle or danger, was the highest offence in the time of Tacitus, and long before. In the sequel, Heidrek, meeting some men (soldiers) with a captive, redeems him, on which the latter desires to be taken into his retinue. "No," said the prince, "how shalt thou be true to me, a stranger, when thou betrayedst thy lanardrottinn from whom thou receivedst so many benefits? Get thee hence."—c. 9, fo. 8 b.

their fellow men, and as a final resource, their chiefs.*
 Wherever the soil is cultivated from sterility to productiveness, the tiller naturally acquires a right of possession, in favour of which, under circumstances like these, the community will readily relinquish their own prior claims from motives of policy, if not of necessity. To the warriors of the north, who for centuries prowled over the seas and infested every approachable coast of Europe in quest of plunder, it was easier to purchase than to raise the necessaries of life. The occupant of the fields gained by his Bonde.
 industry from nature, was the bonde, whose appellation, etymologically connected with the Persic bund and Latin fundus, an estate, was employed to denote at once a proprietor and cultivator of land.† As the demand for the produce of his skill and industry increased, the bonde enlarged his sphere of action, purchased more serfs, and employed more labourers. These he maintained in the same manner as the war-nobles supported their retainers, in board and lodging. When his assistants became more numerous, he substituted allotments of ground as their alimony, and an allotment of this kind was a veisla; the customary wages in food became land for the use of which personal services were required. Here also arose two descriptions of territorial occupancy; the land, exempt from all conditional tenure, and the land held by services, which in process of time, were commuted by rent. The former considered merely as cultivated ground, was called bund, a farm or estate, and the proprietor in very early times was a person of considerable importance, and though not ranking with the nobility, it was no disparagement to be connected

* Ynglinga Saga, c. 18. Hervarar S. c. 11, &c.

† Plausibly derived from the Goth. bauan, gabauan, O. N. bua, to till; buan, A. S. to inhabit; but the Sanskrit bhundatum, to support, maintain, shows bonde and fundus to be connected with the same ideas as those already noticed in other appellations of early times.

CHAP.
V.

Hus-band.

with his family by marriage.* In time however, the Eonde, as he was called, declined from his high estate, and the appellation denoted a mere farmer, the hus-band or master of a household. But the cultivated land, considered in the light of absolute property, was everywhere designated by an expressive name, etymologically connected with the Gothic, atta, a father; which taking its origin in the Sanskrit root ad, to eat, denotes the provider of edibles; and thus öthli in Old Norse, or ethel in Anglo Saxon, like the patria, in a limited sense, was a paternal inheritance. By a process common to all the Indo-European languages, the noun was changed to an adjective, by adding the termination all, ödhall, paternal; and hence ödaljord, and ödalland, in the more recent Norse, is heritable land:—

Thann bad hann eignatz
ódal völlu
ódal völlu
oc alldnar bygdir.†

Rig bad him to own heritable plains heritable fields and ancient vills.

Derivations of allodium.

15. The attempt of Ihre and others of the old school of etymology, to deduce allodium from this odal or rather

* The nobility of the north were comprehended in the general term tignarmen, men of title, from tign (=dign-itas, Latin) honor, glory, rank, title; and all others were otignarmenn, undignified men. The former were courtiers enjoying offices with fiefs annexed to them, and are ascertained to have been superior to the bonds by the words of the princess Ragnhilda, who, in rejecting the proposals of Haco Ivar, said that as she was descended from an illustrious race, she would never marry one who was not a tignarman. (Heims Kringla, t. II. p. 112.) But in the History of the king St. Olaf, it is said of the father of Sigrida Storrada, queen of Sweden, who was in the number of the bonds, that he was the equal of princes, though he had not their title. Of Torgny, a judge in Triundia, it is stated that though he exercised great authority, and by his numerous retinue and magnificence, excited the king's admiration, he was only a bond. (Olafs Skotkonungs Saga, pp. 478, 482.) At last the bonde was put in opposition to serving-man in the ancient Laws of Westmannia. "Hwat han ær hælder bonde æller thianista man, lænsman, riddare æller swen." Whether he be a bond or servant, a baron, knight or esquire.—Westm. L. Thing. B. c. 19. ap. Ihre.

† Rigs Mal, St. 38.

ödal and the adjective all, is necessarily a failure;* alimony and not patrimony being the essential idea of allodium, more anciently and more correctly written alod, with and without the Latin termination.

*Allodial
Land.*

With these considerations premised, there is less difficulty in apprehending the full force of the passages in the Sagas which refer to the state of patrimonial and feudal property in Scandinavia. The allodial land originally granted to a chief for his maintenance, or by him to his follower without any condition of tenure annexed, was the same wherever it existed, and calls for no further observation. A few instances to shew the use of the primitive terms veisla, the land given in lieu of the original ration of food instead of pay,† and len, the land given on condition of services to be rendered, on failure of which the land re-

* Ihre in his examples of the word fails to produce all preceding odal, excepting in the phrase in the Icelandic law, ad alldödle, which he says denotes perpetuity of possession. It does so, but not exactly in the way he means, and according to his own quotation: "Ad Simon skylde vera thera hofdinge og hædste kœnnemadur ad alldödle:"—that Simon should be their captain and high priest for all his family; that is, the office should descend to his children. (I. Macch. 14.) Here ölli occurs in its first sense of family on the father's side; its second is patrimony, and third and most general is native country, fatherland. With atta, Gothic, a father, is connected the German adal, nobility or noble extraction; A.-Sax. ædhelo, Frankish adal, the same; Alamannic edil, kin, family; and Norse edli, lineage:—

Nu mun seigia	Now will I tell,
sonur Hamundar	O sons of Hamund,
hvort edli var	what the extraction was ockart brædra.	of us brethren.

Sagan af Halfe k. c.

The following passage seems to have been overlooked by Ihre: "Haralldur kongur let Orkneyinga sverja sier aull otholl sin." King Harold caused the Orkneyines to swear all their paternal estates to himself.—HeimsKringla, t. 1. p. 531. Here is the conjunction of the words in the position to support his etymon.

† When the Romans in the time of their kings, still retained the feudal system, a circumstance occurred similar to what is noticed of veisla, a feast, from veita, to bestow upon. As veisla was first food, then stipend, then land, and lastly the rent of land; so in Latin, vesci, to feed, produced

CHAP.
V.

verted to the lord, will suffice. In the life of king Olaf it is recorded that Jarl Harek had the whole government of Haland, partly as a fief, and partly as alimony.* The former is called a læn, which answers to fief or feud, and for which he rendered homage and service; but the latter is the veisla, with the service commuted to a stated rent, at first paid in produce, and afterwards in money.† Some of the petty or provincial kings of Norway, before the reign of Harold the Fair-haired, gave a third part of their realm to a nobleman for his aid in men and person in defence of the whole. Harold, on subduing those little monarchs, retained such as rendered him homage, in their ancient governments, but changed their title to Jarl. As a general rule, the conqueror ordained that all paternal estates, (“otholl öll,”) should be vested in himself, and that all the inhabitants occupying land, (“alla buendur,”) should pay him a land tax. Over every province he appointed a jarl to administer public law and justice, and to collect the revenues arising from mulcts, forfeitures and taxes. Every jarl was to have the third part of the rents and taxes for his table and costs, that is, for his sustentation. This allowance was the same as the third penny to the earl of an English shire. Each of these jarls was required to have under him four or more barons, of whom each was to have twenty marks for his veisla or sustentation. Every jarl was to provide sixty soldiers for the king’s service, and every baron, the companion or adviser and assessor of the victus, what was fed upon; then the rent of the land on which the victus grew, was vectigal, probably because it was a portion of the fruit or other produce; and lastly vectigal became the name of tribute and revenue.

* “Harekr hafdi alla syslu a Halogalandi, suma i læn, en suma at veitzlu.”—Olafs Saga, c. 125.

† “Wædsla, census, tributum; a verbo veita, præstare, exhibere Sæpius occurrit in Annalibus S. Olai.” “Vasallus ita dictus a vaisla, i. e. redditibus et fructibus prædii aut feudi, ut est in Hirdshra (the ancient collection of Norwegian Court Laws), et inde Waislumen vasalli dicti sunt.”—Loccen. Lexic. Juris Sueio-Goth. Holm. 1674.

jarl, was in like manner, to furnish twenty men. So greatly had Harold augmented his revenues, that, as Snorro observes, each jarl enjoyed a larger income than the former kings. And when this was known at Drontheim, many powerful nobles resorted to king Harold and became his men, that is, his vassals.*

In a subsequent reign, two brothers Thorgot and Argot came into Veradel, in Norway, with a small retinue, from the king of Sweden, in whose name they required the inhabitants to pay tribute and taxes. The people in a Thing or public meeting, agreed to do so, provided their own king did not require the same payment. The ambassadors then proceeded to the king St. Olaf, who on becoming acquainted with this transaction, observed, that ‘while the country was governed by jarls, it was not extraordinary that the people should render aid and obedience to those who were their rulers by right of birth, rather than submit to foreign kings.’ To this Argot replied, ‘If you are resolved to hold your kingdom, I advise you to meet our king and become his man, on which we will intercede with him to grant you the kingdom to be held as a feod.’ St. Olaf not only refused, but ordered the ambassadors to be hanged at Drontheim.†

King Harold the Fair-haired caused the inhabitants of the Orkneys to swear all their paternal inheritances to him, and when the jarl of the Orkneys was reconciled to him,

* “Tha soktu til Haralds kongs marger rikis menn oc giorthiz hanns mann.”—Haralds ens Harfagra Saga, c. 6, tit. “Landsrettur Haralds kongs.” In feudal Latin the phrase “gioraz hanns mann,” to become his man, was homo devenire, or fidelis homo devenire, in the ninth century. “Ut nullus infidelium nostrorum, qui liberi homines sunt, in nostro regno immorari vel proprietatem habere permittatur, nisi fidelitatem nobis promiserit et noster aut nostris fidelis homo deveniat.”—Capit. Caroli Calvi, xxxvi, c. 4, An. 865.

† “Oc geraz hans madr,” and become his vassal. “At hann fai ther at lani thetta riki,” that he may give you this kingdom in loan or feud.—Sagan af Olafi hinom Helga, c. 57.

CHAP.
V.

the latter becoming Harold's vassal, received his lands in fee, but was not to pay tribute for them, because the seas were infested with pirates.*

Fowd of Jutland.

16. Patrimonial inheritance is illustrated by the following account of the ancient government of the Shetland Islands: "The most ancient government of Zetland, while subject to the kings of Norway and Denmark, was by a governor called the Fowd of Zetland, who was judge in all causes civil and criminal. Under him was a judge of every parish called the Fowd of the parish, who only was judge in small matters, and referred others to the grand Fowd, and sent the malefactor to him to be tried. The Fowd of Zetland was also the chamberlain, and collected the crown rent, which was at that time only called scatt, payable in butter, fish oil, and a very coarse sort of cloth called the wad-null; the arable ground being all at first the property of the immediate possessors thereof, which went to their successors by a verbal title called Udell succession, whereby all the children, male and female, succeed equally to the father in his estate heritable and moveable. Thus Zetland continued to be under Danish government until the year 1470."†

Udell Succession.

* "Harralldur kongur let Orkneyinga sverja sier aull otholl sinn; eptir that sættunst their kongur oc jarl; oc jarl giordist hans madhur, oc toc laund i læn af Kongi; oc skylldi eigi giallda skatta af thui at thar var herskatt miöc."—Olafs Saga, c. 99.

† Gough's Camden, v. III, p. 736. This title has already been mentioned (c. II, 1.), as an obvious cognate of fads, fæder, father, &c., which Professor Jäkel refers to the verb fedan, to feed. Anciently it was written faad, then faud, and, as in the Northern and Gothic languages, AU=o, and indifferently for each other, we find faud in old Scottish fowd; in Swedish fogde, anciently fogat, fogati, fougte, Germ. vogt, and vogd, all denoting the governor of a country, city, or castle. On the coast of Lancashire there are the ruins of a castle, called the Pile or Peel of Fowdrie, i. e. the castle of the government of the Fowd, thus proving that a faad was at one time or other the governor. The following extracts shew its existence in Scottish Acts of Parliament.

"Givand—to the said Lord Robert Stewart and his foirsaidis heretabill

17. The degree and measure of power possessed by the aldoras, whether exercising supreme authority under that title, or invested with rude ensigns of royalty, is not exactly connected with the subjects of these investigations. Yet to omit all notice of it would seem to leave the whole incomplete. Several learned writers, among whom Grotius is not the least, are of opinion, that their power was so limited, that such as were kings, were so only in name. Tacitus himself says, that the Germans were not commanded, were not governed, but acted at their entire pleasure and discretion.* This declaration, of one who had observed their manners and studied their polity, seems to be corroborated by the etymology of their title, and the bond of union between the chiefs and their followers, of which a faint memory is preserved in the position of theoretical writers on the English constitution, that the allegiance of the subject is due to the king in return for his protection.

On the other hand, there are writers who, appearing to look with a jealous eye upon popular liberty, represent the government of the Germanic nations in a manner altogether incompatible with the probabilities, derived from the import of their titles of authority, the conditions of the feudal contract, which as we have seen, was a real compact and not a creature of logical inference, and with the broad fact that the subjects and chiefs deliberated together upon all questions with arms in their hands. Wherever that is the case there is danger of popular licentiousness, but none justices and schereffis and fowdis foirsaidis, full power speciall mandement and charge."—Acts, Ja. 6, 1581.

"Approves—the dispositioun maid be umquhile Patrick erle of Orknay of the lands of Fluagarth, &c., within the said countrie and fawdrie of Zetland, and schirefdome of Orknay."—Acts Cha. I.

In the Zetland Islands there were ten fowds under the chief, and their jurisdiction was called sucken=socn, A.-Saxon, the liberty or privilege of trying causes.

* Hist. IV.

CHAP.
V.

of an excess of power in the person of the chief. Sir Francis Palgrave, however, to whose opinion, on subjects of this kind, great respect is paid, maintains that the influence of the chiefs must always have guided the decisions of the people in those armed parliaments.

The maxims that the king can do no wrong, and that he is amenable to no controul, are certainly not founded upon the Germanic constitutions, nor yet upon the feudal law, which contemplated the possibility of felony in a lord against a vassal. They are of modern invention, and seem to have been drawn from suggestions of the Roman Law, which was favourable to despotism. As they are attended by no practical inconvenience, they ought not to be disturbed for want of the foundation ascribed to them. What the Germans themselves thought of the matter we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus, who reports that the Burgundians punished their *hendinos or kings, by deposition, not only for the faults which they committed, but for reverses over which man has no sort of command; and he compares this practice to a custom of the Egyptians. Nor need it be mentioned, that it is still the practice in the barbarous states of Asia and the North of Africa.

Besides this testimony, the historical records of Sweden, such as they are, repeatedly mention the free part which the Bondar, or popular portion of the national assemblies took in the discussions. Whenever they were dissatisfied with the king or the nobles, they drew their swords and compelled them to assent to such laws as they required. And when king Ingi refused to restore the ancient laws and constitution, they rose in a body and drove him from the meeting with stones.† Other instances might be cited,

* See this significant title explained, infra.

† ‘A thyngi nockru, er Sviar attu vid Inga kong, giora their honom tha kosti hvort hann vilie helldhr vid tha fornum lögum halldha, eda lata af kongdömi. Tha mællti Ingi kongr, ok kuadst ej mundhi kasta theirra tru er riettust væri. Tha æptu Svyar ok threingdu han med grioti, ok raku such as the massacre of king Domaldi;* but reflection upon the nature of the early feudal system, the duties denoted by the titles of their chiefs, and the breach of union between the lord and his follower, equally the consequence of a fault on either side, will render further discussion unnecessary.

hann af logthyngum.' In the national assembly which the Swedes held with king Ingi, they gave him choice, whether he would rather maintain the ancient laws, or abandon the kingdom. On this king Ingi said, they ought not to cast off their fealty, when it was most just. The Swedes were then enraged, and drove him with stones, and expelled him from the law-meeting.—Hervarar Saga, c. 20. This chapter is an addition in 12th century, compiled from History.

* Ynglinga Saga, c. 18.

CHAPTER VI.

That the Anglo-Saxons, in particular, possessed all the chief incidents of the feudal system.

- 1.—Munus and beneficium were displaced by the Teutonic term, because they did not convey the same idea; Felon, properly fellon, an enemy. 2.—Traces of feodality in the Saxon codes numerous. 3.—It was known to the ancient Britons; its origin and the reason of its continuance and universality. 4.—Robbery honourable. 5 & seqq.—Particular incidents of feodality in the Saxon codes.

CHAP.
VI.

Saxon system of Feods.

1. Inspection of the Barbarian codes, imposed upon the several Roman provinces, forces conviction of the overwhelming influence of foreign usages and institutions. The presence of the conqueror is everywhere visible, and the laborious nature of the attempt to render the language of the conquered the medium of communication on subjects the most interesting to every inhabitant, foreign or native, is obvious in the necessity of introducing the terms and idioms peculiar to the former. As the conquerors brought with them their own notions of property, they had their own rules for the partition of the provinces which were the rewards of their valour. As the land, which in primitive times was allowed for the maintenance of the chief, and afterwards by consent of the community, or usurped by lawless power, had become transmissible in his family, was denominated among the Germans his alod, so that term was deemed the suitable appellation of land, which descended to the children of either sex without the condition of military service. It was a patrimony,* and as such might

* Commonly, but not universally: we find three different kinds of estate equally have been called by the more northern name of odal, but the conquerors were Teutons, with the exception of the Longobards, who, however, had been so long resident among them as to have lost the distinctive characteristics of their Scandinavian origin. All the rest of the subdued territory was held of the state subject to military service, and every tenement must have been called by the conquerors by that name which had long been familiar to them. What that name was cannot be ascertained by direct evidence. We know that the Saxons called a military feod knight's meat-home, and it is reasonable to believe that the rest of the Teutons either used the same term or its synonyme föda, answering to the Scandinavian veisla, and lehn answering to læn. For some time after their settlement, they used the Latin words beneficium and munus. The latter, which seems to be the etymological correspondent of læn (by permutation M=L), denoted land held at will; but the former signified land held for life. They did not, therefore, clearly express the ideas suggested by the vernacular terms of the Teutons, but they continued in use for some time after the first appearance, in the ninth century, of the Germanic word feod-um, in Latin instruments.* It was a word of general application, as readily understood by all the Germanic nations, and eventually it superseded both benefice and munus, and stood for both mete and lehn. By the decree of Charles the Fat, where it first occurs, it called by the same name: "Alodes de hereditate, alodes de conquisitu, et alodes de donatione domini imperatoris."—Capit. Caroli Calvi, xxx, c. 5, An. 860. The term here appears to denote an estate not subject to military service, but which might be inherited or purchased, or be derived from the gift of a prince.

Munus.
Benefice.

* Feudi porro vocabulum sub Carolo Crasso primo auditum, says Ducange. It is found in the decree on the Roman expedition, about 884, published by Frehere, Goldart, and others: "Cuicunque secundum hanc legem expeditio imperetur, si ad Curiam Gallorum, hoc est, in campum qui Rungalle dicitur, dominum suum non comitetur, et ibi cum militari apparatu non repræsentetur, Feodo, præter hos, qui cum gratia dominorum suorum remanserunt in conspectu nostro, absque spe recuperationis privetur."

CHAP.
VI.Felony.

was enacted that such as did not accompany their lords into the field with military trappings, should lose their feud without any prospect of recovery. This fault, it may be observed, and its consequence, was a felony in modern orthography; but in all probability, it was originally written in Latin fellonia, for “fellones” meant felons in the ninth century.* Owing to the strange conceits of legal antiquaries and etymologists,† the meaning of a very plain word has been much obscured, and its orthography, like that of alod, has been corrupted, in order to adapt it to a preconceived definition of the thing denominated. As the original alliance of the chief and his follower was a military compact for mutual defence, any act contrary to it placed them in an opposite relation to each other. To break a league was expressed in the Latin of the seventh century by the classical word rebellare, but the sense is manifestly taken from this state of opposition. The feudal tenant in a state of rebellion was termed the fellon of his lord, and this old Teutonic word has a corresponding verb in every Gothic dialect; in English, to fell, meaning to cause to fall.‡ In Latin, the etymological cognate is bellare, to fight or make war against, and the sense of fellon is contained in the proper name Bellona, which is constructed on the same grammatical principle. Of all the words, the root is the Sanskrit BHALL, which the Brahmins explain by vadhe, to signify that the idea is contained in the act of striking, causing pain, or killing. He that rebelled, became a fellon, and as the compact by which he held his feud was at an end, the feud was said to be forfeited by the vassal’s

* “Non tibi sit curæ, rex, quæ tibi referunt fellones atque ignobiles.”
—Capit. Caroli Calvi, t. 23, c. ult.

† See Blackstone, Comm. IV, 95.

‡ The Alamannic is fallen, Dutch vellen; the Norse fella, signifies also to kill. The Frankish fællen is to condemn. A similar idea at the bottom of these words connects them in sense. Wachter mentions fel, an enemy, as likely to have given rise to fellonia, but thinks that fello is connected with feld, an assault or invasion.

fellony. Before the word fellones was introduced into Latin, the term was infideles, meaning only those who had broken their fealty,* and consequently fellones, the vernacular word, implied the same.

2. It is a very remarkable circumstance in the history of feodality, that although the vestiges of it are more numerous, and more striking in the Laws of the Anglo Saxons, than in any other Germanic code of that age, most of our legal antiquaries and some of our historians, who make no doubt of its existence among the “northern nations,” deny that it was known to the German and Danish conquerors of Britain. Had they bestowed a little reflection upon one part of the subject, they would have perceived that for the Saxons to have formed a solitary exception would have been unaccountable and little less than miraculous. Their arguments are deduced from the absence of some particular terms of the feudal law, as it existed in the eleventh century, from the Anglo Saxon codes and legal instruments of donation and foundation, and testaments. They are quite satisfied that William the Conqueror introduced the knowledge and practice of feuds into this country, and the titles of honor which resulted from them;† though, in reality, he did nothing more than import a few Norman customs and engraft them upon the Saxon system,

*Feodality
among the Anglo Saxons.*

* So we must understand “nostri infideles et Communes contrarii.”—Capitul. Car. Calvi, xxxvi, c. 1, published in 865.

† “The dignities or titles of honor which now exist in England, derive their origin from the feudal institutions, and were first introduced into this country by the Normans.”—Cruise, Treatise on Dignities, 1823, ch. 1, s. 1. This is a book of great authority among lawyers, and in this, its first passage, are two grossly erroneous assertions. The titles of honour, enumerated in the same chapter, are those of baron, earl, duke, marquis and viscount. Of these, baron, earl and duke, existed before the arrival of the Normans, and those of marquis and viscount were created in a subsequent age, after the failure of the Norman line of princes. William attempted, without success, to give currency to the title of count; but to him may be attributed the introduction of the title of countess, which is the only memorial of his baronagium.

CHAP.
VI.Universality of Feodalism.

as he found it described in the written laws of the kingdom. And as to the titles of honour, he could not introduce what had existed among the Saxons as well as the Northmen from all ages.

3. To put this question on a right footing, it must be observed that the system of feods was not always the same: that is, it was more simple in its early state, than it became previous to its extinction. A feod was land granted by a superior, whether a state or an individual, who required military service in return for it; and it was the substantial and durable substitute of the actual “epulæ pro stipendio” given by the princes of Germany to their soldiers in the time of Tacitus, when money was unknown to them. This mode of feod existed from time immemorial in Asia, was known to the ancient Britons, prevailed all over Scandinavia, and is frequently named in the ancient Icelandic history of the Faroe Islands,* was common among the Scythians,† and is found in the centre of Africa and in the islands of the Pacific Ocean, which until the eighteenth century were utterly unknown to Europeans. More or less, feods must have been granted by every state, that extended its dominion by conquest or peaceable colonization. Its invention required no sagacity. If the first horde of Asiatic wanderers found themselves sole possessors of the plains and forests of Europe, and had no occasion for defensive measures, the feudal system might for a time lie dormant. But it would necessarily be roused from its slumbers by subsequent arrivals. Whenever a horde or tribe, subsisting, as we are informed their descendants did so lately as the reign of Trajan, by pasturage, hunting, and depredations on their neighbours, occupied a pasture or hunting ground, they had portions of territory exposed to incursions, * ‘Halfgrimr var hofdhingi yfir helming eyjanna, ok hielt theim helmingi i len af Harald i konungi.’ Halfgrim was captain of half of the islands, and held that half in fee of king Harold (Grafeld.)—Færeyinga Saga, c. 4. See also, c. 25 & 34.

† Gibbon, Decline.

and had enemies of the same quality as themselves, incited by love of plunder, and provoked or provoking by aggression. In such a state, though the pasturage or hunting ground was the property of the community, there would be a necessity in the larger tribes at least, for defenders of the borders, who to all intents and purposes of feodality, would hold the guarded territory by military service. If a tribe extended its grounds by conquest, the additional land would, by a still greater necessity, become a military feed, or be divided into several such feeds. The practice was in reality, nothing more than an acquiescence of the state in one or more of its members taking possession for the whole, of the booty acquired by arms, and maintaining themselves in it as long as they were able: the first armies were banditti; and the very name of warrior implies a robber in its origin;* and this was the rule of all despoilers, antient and modern:—

“ For why? the good old rule
Sufficeth them; the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.”

In all cases of defending distant or conquered possessions, the party employed was a detachment from the state, and its servant. The service could no longer be paid for by a provision of food and lodging, and the necessary substitute, before the invention of money, was land, or rather the enjoyment of its produce at free will. Under more prosperous circumstances a rent or tribute was exacted. If the servant failed in his duty, the land was either lost to the state, or the state recalling him, punished his negligence, called a fellony, and granted the territory to another on the same conditions.

4. This is the simple origin of the system, and as Pinkerton observes, it prevailed wherever conquest was known. Robbery, antiently honorable.

* Sanskrit hara, war, hari, a warrior, from hri, to take by force and violence, to ravish, &c. See p. 123.

CHAP.
VI.

As to the other services, conditions of tenure, incidents of the possession, and complicated relations between the superior and his dependent, which were subsequently introduced, they were originally, on the part of the tenant, commutations of the duty of personal appearance in the field, and on the part of the lord, exactions, gradually usurped, for the discharge of his duty of maintaining and protecting his vassal. Mr. Cruise says, very correctly, that where a tract of land was granted by a sovereign prince to one of his followers, to be held immediately of himself, by military or other honorable services, with a jurisdiction, it was called a feudum nobile, and conferred nobility on the person to whom it was granted.* He that at any time or from any source, had power to defend the marches, had power to exercise the jurisdiction requisite to maintain his position, which was honorable and noble, because from the earliest ages military robbery by sea and land has been accounted honorable. Piracy continued to be honorable down to the fifteenth century, when king Eric of Pomernia finished a long career as a pirate chief.

Particular incidents of Saxon Feods.

5. The settlement of the mixed people called Anglo-Saxons in Britain was not effected without difficulty. They gained the land only step by step, and were compelled to defend every stage of their progress. If the Longobards imported feudal tenures into Italy, it can hardly be imagined that the northern Goths left them behind, or that the Franks did not carry them into Gaul; and how it can be believed that the Saxons, Frisians, Jutes and Angles, were ignorant of what was known to all the rest of the Indo-European tribes, from their first establishment in this quarter of the world, is altogether inconceivable. But this consideration will have no weight with those who have been taught to trace the origin of feudal institutions to those comparative novelties, the march laws of Alexander Severus and Probus, and therefore, it is necessary for correctly ascertaining the antiquity of our titles of honour, to show by direct and positive evidence, that all the chief incidents of military tenure, its heriots, scutages, wardships, reliefs, homages, escheats and felonies, and marriages at the will of the lord, were in full operation, during the Saxon period of domination in England.*

* Treatise on Dignities, ch. 1. s. 1.

6. One of the principal appurtenances of a military tenement was the relief, which was a gift from a tenant to his lord upon entering the feod on the death of his ancestor.† The reason of it was that by such death the feod seemed to Heriot and Relief.

* A princely donation of treasure and heritable estate with the requital by military service, is often mentioned in Beowulf:—

Ic him tha madhmas
the he me sealde geald æt gudhe swa me gifede wæs leohtan sweorde
he me land forgeaf earth ethel wyn.

I him the treasures which he gave to me
repaid in the war,
with my bright sword
as it was granted to me.
He gave me land
the joy of paternal inheritance.

L. 4975.

† The Sakasenas brought it from Asia, where it still exists as perfect as ever it was in Europe after the epoch of the Norman conquest of England. Speaking of Rajasthan, Col. Tod says, "The first and most essential mark of a feudal relation exists in all its force and purity here. It is a perpetually recurring mark of the source of the grant and the solemn renewal of the pledge which originally obtained it. In Mewar, it is a virtual and bona fide surrender of the fief, and the renewal thereof. It is thus defined in European polity: "a relief is a sum of money due from every one of full age taking a fief by descent." On the demise of a chief, the prince immediately sends a party termed the zubti (sequestrator), consisting of a civil officer and a few soldiers, who take possession of the estate in the prince's name. The heir sends his prayer to the court to be installed in the property, offering the proper relief. This paid, the chief is invited to repair to the presence, where he performs homage and makes protestations of service and fealty; he receives a fresh grant, and the inauguration terminates by the prince girding him with a sword in the old forms of chivalry. It is an imposing ceremony performed in a full assembly of the court, and one of the few which has never been relinquished. The fine paid, and the brand buckled to his side, a steed, turban, plume, and dress of honour given to the chief, the investiture is complete."—Rajasthan, v. I, p. 158.

CHAP.
VI.

revert to the lord, until it were redeemed, or in feodal phrase, relieved by a small gift in token of subjection. This is a summary of the explanations usually given for the relief; but it is not the origin of the custom, in which alone the true reason must be sought. According to Tacitus, he that was admitted a freeman of the nation, received a horse, lance and shield from the state or chief. In the ordinary language of the times, the accoutrements and trappings of a warrior (wer, ber, bar, vir, &c.), were called, with some dialectic variations, his heregeat, his army or war apparatus:—

Gehyrst thu sæ leoda hwæt this folc segeth
hi willath eow to gafole garas syllan ættrynne ord and ealde swurd tha heregeatu the eow
æt hilde ne deah.*

Hear thou, mariner,
what this people say:
They will for tribute
deliver you darts, envenomed points
and ancient swords,
those heriots which in war will not avail you.

On the death of the warrior, his arms reverted to the chief who had bestowed them, but if his son were of age to assume his father's station, they were delivered to him on the offer of a small gift in commutation of the weapons thus relapsed to the original donor. It was thus that valuable hauberks, and celebrated swords, were transmitted from generation to generation. When land descended in this manner, the heregeat or heriot was still claimed by the superior from the new tenant, and it was exacted in proportion to his means, according to the established rule of the law,† which required each man's heriot to be moderate.‡ The valuation of the heriot depended upon the rank of the tenant; the heriot of an earl was eight horses, four helmets, four hauberks, eight lances, eight shields, four swords, and two hundred gold coins. For a king's thegn, the heriot was four horses, two swords, four lances, four shields, one helmet or one hauberk, and fifty gold coins. The middle thegn, corresponding to the less baron of the Normans, paid a heriot of only one horse, a spear, and neck piece.

* Byrhtnoth, l. 94.

† If any one die intestate, (says Cnute) be it through neglect, or through sudden death, then let not the lord draw more from the land than his just and lawful heriot. "Thonne ne teo se hlaford na mare on his æhte butan his rihtan heregeate."—Laws of Cnute, 72.

‡ And beon tha heregeat swa hit mætlic sy, &c.—Ib.

7. The law regulating the heriot is entitled "de Hereotitis." William the Conqueror adopted it, and that it might be understood by his Norman subjects, translated it into French, literally so far as regards the earl and knight's thane, but making some difference with regard to the middle thane.* This translation he entitled "De Releviis;"† Relevium. and, therefore, he has apparently the honor of introducing the word Relief, and attaching it to the pre-existing custom and law. The heriot and the relief were therefore, clearly understood by the Normans to be the same thing; but they were not so; for the heriot had assumed the form of a mortuary, and the relief that of a rent or offering for the permission to enter upon an estate. The former seemed to be a repayment from the dying man, and the latter was an actual payment from his successor.‡

8. Escheats were a principal incident of a military tenure. Escheat

* What relates to the Norman vavassor, or middle thegn of the Saxons, and baro minor, or less baron, of a subsequent period, corresponding with the esquire, who is lord of a manor, runs thus: "De Relief a vavassur a sun lige seinur. Deit estre quite par le cheval sun pere, tel cum il out le iur sa mort, e par sun haume, e par sun escu, e par sun hauberc, e par sa lance, e par sespee. E sil fust desaparaille quil noust cheval ne armes fuste quite par c sol."

† Ll. Will. I. c. 20, de Releviis.

‡ This is evident from the will of Byrbtric, which was made before the time of Cnute. By that instrument he directs to be given to his natural or liege lord (cyne hlaford), eighty pieces of gold, a dagger worth as much, four horses, two swords, and all his hunting dogs. See the Will, in Hearne's Textus Roffens. p. 35, and Hickes, Thes. III, Diss. Epist. p. 52.

CHAP. VI. This term is Norman French, and less significant of the thing originally intended than the Saxon, which was fyrð- and Felony wite, or warlike-expedition penalty. The word is compounded of fyrð, a military expedition, and wite, a punishment or fine, and the whole is constantly used to denote the penalty for neglect to serve in the army on summons from the prince. It occurs so remotely as the reign of Ine over the West Saxons, which commenced in 688, when in all probability his laws were sanctioned by the first witenagemot, assembly of law-makers, or parliament. "If," says that prince, in the law concerning the nobleman who neglects the fyrð, "If a nobleman, owning land, neglect the military service, he shall pay 120 shillings and suffer in his land: one not owning land shall pay 60 shillings; and a churlish man (of the farming class) 30 shillings, for his fyrðwite.* The expression 'suffer in his land' is equivalent to 'forfeit his land,' in which case it would be said by a Norman, to escheat to the lord. Nearly the same penalty for precisely the same offence, which is more particularly described, is found in the Laws of Ethelred: "If any one turn back, without leave, from the fyrð, where the king is in person, his estate shall be endangered."† Now this is the very felony of the feudalists, when they say that if a tenant desert his lord in the field, or fail to deliver him from siege or death, his feod shall be forfeited and escheat to the lord.‡ Some misapprehension of the exact import of the Norman escheite (from eschuer, to fall out) appears to have led to the use of the word felony, to denominate forfeiture by crime, and this error would be easy of commission from the apparent connection of felony, with fallen, to fall. Among the Rajpoots, the fiefs which are only to descend in lineal succession, revert to the prince on failure of heirs, and cannot be bequeathed. Forfeiture for crimes occur and are partial or entire according to the delinquency.* The latter agree with what we now term felonies.

* Be thon the gesidhcund man fyrde forsitte. Gif gesidhcund mon landagende forsitte fyrde. geselle cxx. scill. and tholie his landes. unlandagende lx. scill. Cerlisc xxx. scill. to fierdwite.—Laws of Ine, 51.

† And gif hwa of fyrde butan leafe gewende. the cyning sylf on sy. plihte his are.—Laws of Ethelred VI. Concil. Ænham. 35.

‡ Spelm. Gloss. p. 215.

9. The Anglo Saxons gave the name of hyldo to the personal obeisance and duty to a lord which the rest of the German nations called manskap, translated literally by the feudalists, homagium. Hyld-o, fidelity, is the etymological cognate of the Latin cult-us, which besides the worship of the Gods, signified service, respect, and attendance; but in the usual acceptation of the word, hyldo, was favour or good-will, and gehyld, was a protector. As a forensic term it occupied the same station among the Saxons as homage and fealty among the more recent feudalists. The hyldath of the former was the trunadar eidr of the Northmen, the drosteid and trosteid of the Germans; and from hyld or hyldo, fidelity, was formed gehyld, a protector,† the superior to whom the hold or trusty vassal took the oath of adherence, by which he was bound to honorable service so long as the other rendered him protection. With respect to the service of homage, bishop Nicholson has sufficiently shown that it was performed by the king of the Scots to the king of Northumbria, to Edward, the father, and Edmund, the son of Athelstan; and it must therefore have been performed in like manner by every Saxon lord to his superior, and by every Saxon chief to his lord. It was actually rendered by all the boroughs of England to Edward the Confessor immediately before his coronation,‡

* Col. Tod, Rajasthan, I, p. 160.

† The derivation from gehealdan (from healdan, to cover, to hold, keep,) to preserve, does not affect what is said of the formation of gehyld from hyld, for gehealdan belongs to the same family in the Indo-European dialects. Heald gives both the Saxon Hold and English hold. The root is Sanskrit CHAL, to cover. See the note upon manred, p. 114.

‡ Epistle prefixed to Wilkins, Leges Anglo-Saxon. p. 6, 7. He quotes Malmesbury, f. 45, "Hominio palam omnibus dato."

CHAP. VI. and the form of the oath of fealty is yet extant.* That the Latin word homagium, does not appear in our ancient laws before the reign of Henry I. is really a consideration of no weight, since the thing itself existed, and was described by a term, belonging to the language of the country in which most of its laws were written. Homagium however, is mentioned in Henry's code, as if it were a duty well known, and essential to be performed.† The English persisted in using their vernacular term down to the time of Henry III., and holde othes was the slight change which eight centuries had wrought in the original hyldathas, introduced by the Saxon conquerors of Britannia Romana:—

Hold Oaths.

“Wyllam the rede kyng—
—sende as quyclyche as he mygte, hys sonde, Holde othes that men hym suore thoru al Engelande,
Vor of his eldore brother he was evere in doute,
So that men suor hym holde othes in to al that londe aboute.‡

Wardship.

10. Wardship took place when a tenant died leaving his heir a minor, on which the estate reverted into the possession of the lord until it was released by the payment of the relief and the performance of homage. This was a custom so peculiarly Gothic that instances are numerous and continual in the ancient literature of the northern nations; and the very laws relating to the feudal guardian and his pupil, are transcripts from the Longobardic code.§ Among the Anglo-Saxons, the duties of the warder to the ward were well understood and regulated by their laws.|| It is not

* Thus man sceal swerigean hyldathas, (thus are oaths of fealty to be sworn,) is the title of the formularies in Ancient Laws and Institutions of England, p. 76.

† Quotcunque dominos, aliquis habeat, vel quantumcumque de aliis teneat, ei magis obnoxius est, et ejus residens esse debet, cujus legius est. Si multis homagium fecerit, &c.—Cap. xliii. s. 3.

‡ Robert of Gloucester, p. 183.

§ See them in Spelman's Gloss. p. 384 and p. 565.

|| Laws of Ine, 38. Council of Ænham, 26. Constitutions of Ethelred, 21. “And let no man,” says Cnute, “compel either a woman or a maiden to him, whom she herself dislikes.”—Secular Laws, 75.

until Henry I. reformed the feudal obligations according to the standard of the Saxon institutes, that we find legal notice of wardship. In the first of his laws, he mentions those of Edward the Confessor as amended by his father, and his own intention to continue them in force. Immediately afterwards he promises for himself, and commands his barons, "to make the widow or one of the relations, the guardian of the estate and the children, to restore the feod to the heir on his arrival at maturity, and to marry the heir and bestow the estate conformably to their own pleasure."* Wardship is an incident of feodality in Mewar.†

11. Scutage was the feudal term for the mulct originally incurred by a vassal who neglected the obligation to accompany his lord in military expeditions. The Saxons called it fyrdwite, as before mentioned. This personal attendance in war was the first and most immediate act of fealty in the vassal, and the scutage was only the commutation for this necessary service. It was first levied regularly all over the kingdom by Henry II.,‡ but it was as fully ascertained by law as any other fine, before the days of Ine;§ and it prevailed equally among the Danes in the kingdoms of Northumbria and East England, and among the Saxons in the rest of the island. It is not, therefore, remarkable that it is still in full force in Rajasthan.||

* Si quis baronum meorum, sive aliorum qui de me tenent, &c.—I. s. 2.

† It often terminates, as in the European system, in the nefarious act of defrauding the infant in order to confer his estate upon a favorite. See Col. Tod, p. 161.

‡ Lord Lyttleton, Hist. Hen. II., Vol. IV, p. 15.

§ Laws of Ine, 51. See Laws of Cnute, 12, 14.

|| Escuage or Scutage, the phrase in Europe to denote the amerciamment for non attendance, is also known and exemplified in deeds. Failure from disaffection, turbulence, or pride, brought a heavy fine; the sequestration of the whole or part of the estate, both of which I have often witnessed.—Col. Tod, p. 148. In Append. No. XVI, is a modern deed for enforcing Scutage.

CHAP.
VI.

Miscellaneous duties, &c.
of Saxon
feodality.

12. In the following laws taken promiscuously from several codes, other obligations of the feudal system are discernible.

a. If any man, (i. e. vassal, suprà p. 110,) depart from his lord without license, or settle in another shire, he shall go where he was before, and pay to his lord sixty shillings.* This was equivalent to the feudal law by which a feod was forfeited if the tenant refused to perform his due service, or denied his obligation.

Treachery.

b. If a man plot against his lord's life, he shall be answerable to him in his life and in all that he hath; or prove himself true according to his lord's were.† If, says the feudal law of Conrad, the vassal assault his lord, or traitorously assail him with sword or poison; if he become an enemy of his lord, or adhere to his lord's enemies; if he become a traitor to his lord: in each case he is a felon, and his feod is forfeited.

c. And we have ordained respecting plots against the lord: that the man shall be liable with his life, if he cannot deny the felony, or shall afterwards be convicted by the threefold ordeal.‡

d. If any one give freedom to his vassal (mæn) at the altar, he shall be free of the nation (folc fry). The giver of freedom shall have his heritage and weregild, and the protection, or price of it, of his family, whether he be over the march, wherever he may be.§

Private War.

e. We also declare that a man, may fight along with his lord, without committing war, if any one attack his lord; thus may a lord fight for his man; but a man may not fight against his lord.|| A like enactment is found in the feudal laws of private war, by which a vassal, holding feods of divers lords who were at variance, was bound to

* Laws of Ine, 39.

† Laws of Alfred, 4.

§ Wihtred, 8.

‡ Athelstan, 4.

|| Alfred, 42.

obey the command of his chief lord to fight for him, saving the service and fealty due to any other lord for the feod which he held of him.* So that, in point of fact, a vassal might be so circumstanced as to be unable to fight for any of his lords, without committing a felony to the others. Bracton states the law of private war to be thus:—If a vassal have tenements under different lords, and dissensions arise among his chief lords, he shall always stand in his own person by him to whom he performed his allegiance, and by his attorney with the others.†

f. Of him who entertains the man of another person without license. Let no man receive the man of another without the leave of him whom he had previously followed.‡

g. Every Saxon lord was bound by law to entertain persons in his household, who were termed his hiredmen, or men of his court, and for whom he was responsible.§ This court may have originated with the feudal court baron, established for the tenants or vassals of the barony.

h. In the laws of Edward the Confessor, the word feoda occurs as the well known term for tenements;|| and domini, lords, are mentioned in relation to their homines, men, precisely as those terms are understood by feudalists to mean feudal lords and their vassals.¶ And that a Saxon military tenure was wanting in nothing essential to constitute a holding, as understood in the utmost rigour of the feudal law, is ascertained by the description of the jurisdiction of Saxon lords in their fiefs, the several branches of which jurisdiction were so well known, and of so long a standing,

Court or Household.

Feodum, a tenement.

* Glanville, l. ix, c. 1.

† Bract. l. II, c. 35, s. 5.

‡ Laws of Edward the Elder, 10. See also Secular Laws of Cnute, 28.

§ Cnute, 31.

|| De libertate eorum qui de feodis ecclesie tenuerint. Quicumque de ecclesia tenuerit, vel in feodo ecclesie manserit, &c.—c. 4.

¶ Lege Anglorum sunt were vel precium, et manbote de occisis erga dominos quorum homines interfecti erant.—cap. 12.

CHAP.
VI.

as to be denominated customs.* It is said in the thirty-fourth chapter of this code, that William I. acquiesced in its enactments by the advice and at the request of his barons, “consilio et precatu baronum;” and William himself says, in the preface to his own laws, “These are the laws and customs, which king William granted to the people of England after the conquest of the land;† and the very same which king Edward his kinsman maintained before him.‡

Miscellaneous terms.

13. The least that those writers can do, who choose to assert that William I. introduced the feudal system into England, will be to point out exactly what he imported,

* Descriptio Libertatum diversarum.—Archiepiscopi, Comites, barones, et milites suos, et proprios servientes suos, scilicet dapiferos, pincernas, camerarios, cocos, pistores, sub suo frithborgo habebunt: et ipsi suos armigeros vel alios servientes suos sub suo frithborgo; quod si ipsi forisfacerent et clamor vicinorum insurgent de eis, ipsi haberent eos ad rectum in curia sua, si haberent sacham et socham, tol et theam, et infangensthef.—cap. 21.

In the next law these liberties or privileges and jurisdictions are defined. It concludes thus: ‘Et illi qui non habent consuetudines quas supradiximus, ante justiciam regis faciant rectum eciam in hundredo, vel in wapentachiis, vel in schiris.’—cap. 22.

† Conquest, in feudal language, was purchase, as early as the 9th century. Thus Charles the Bald, in his Capitula, An. 860, opposes alods by inheritance and conquest to alods by imperial grant: ‘alodes illorum de hereditate et de conquisitu,—alodes de donatione domini imperatoris.’—Suprà, p. 141, n.

Conquest, Conqueror. And ‘perquisitor’ was the synonyme of ‘conquæstor.’ “The first purchaser, perquisitor,” says Mr. Causton, “is he who first acquired the estate to his family, whether transferred to him by sale, by gift, or by any other method, excepting only that of descent. The feudists frequently stile such a person conquisitor or conquæstor, and the Norman writers conquereur. (Grand Coust. c. 25, fo. 40.); which, by the way, was the appellation assumed by William the Norman, to denote that he was the first of his family who acquired the crown of England, and from whom, therefore, all future claims by descent must be derived; though afterwards by disuse of the word in a feudal sense, it became associated with the idea of victory, and was supposed to refer to his forcible subjugation of the dethroned Harold’s dominions.”—Rights of Heirship, ch. II. canon 3, p. 203, 205.

Conqueror and Perquisitor or Purchaser.

‡ Cez sunt les leis e les custumes que li reis William grantad al pople de Engleterre apres le cunquest de la terre: icelles meimes que li reis Edward, sun cusin, tint deuant lui.

which the Saxons did not possess during the six centuries of their occupation of the country before his arrival. There are some phrases and appellations of men that never became titles of honor, all of which have reference to this particular polity, but scarcely require classification. The term mandryhten, for instance, is literally a vassal lord, a lord of the homages:—

Mod ceare mændon mondryhtnes cwealm.*

Sad in mind they mourned
the slaughter of their liege-lord.

Such vassals, particularly those of a prince, were his hearth companions, his table companions, or his hall companions, all of which are synonymous with the palace counts of the empire, and no doubt existed before the time of Tacitus, who mentions companions only; though his “comites” are rather to be understood of such as were either then or soon afterwards of an order of nobility. Cæsar mentions the followers of Belgic noblemen by the names of comites and familiares, household companions. In Beowulf, a vassal is denominated a bord geneat and a beod geneat, the enjoyer, partaker,† or companion of the lord at table, so that these terms are nearly the same as veisluman:—

Hall Companions & Palace Counts.

We synt Hygelaces

We are Hygelac's

* Beowulf, l. 6292.

† A.-Sax. geneat, Frank and Alam. ginot and genæz, N. Germ. genoss, a companion, are formed with the collective prefix ge, gi=ga Gothic, and nyt A.-S., notz and nutz Germ., utility, from the verbs neotan, nutzen, to use or enjoy a thing. A.-S. genyttan, to enjoy an office. In O. Sw. note, Icelandic naute, a companion; and niute, to enjoy, is the same verb as nutzen and neotan. Ihre quotes the Rhythmic Chronicle, p. 79, to show the title of knights companions:

Tha war i hertug Erikes rota
Bade riddare och riddarenotta.

There were in duke Eric's train, both knights and knight-companions.

He considers them to be the same as the ridherlikæ, who appear in the letters of king Magnus, 1344, at the end of the collection of Laws of Citizenship (Leges Birc. p. 16) to be attendants equal to knights.

CHAP.
VI.

bord geneatas.

L. 682.

table partakers

Breat bolgen mod beod geneatas
eaxl gesteallanThe prince slew in angry mood his table companions, his shoulder supporters.

L. 3424.

Swa bealdode bearn Ecgtheowes guma gudha cuth godum dædum dread æfter dome
nealles druncen sloh heorth geneatas.So in age increased the son of Egtheow
a man famed in wars for gallant deeds :
he acted according to justice,
nor drunken struck his hearth companions.

L. 4349.

This kind of vassal occurs as early in A.-Saxon jurisprudence as the laws of Ine, in 689, by which a king's geneat was placed on an equality with a twihind man, or person of the second class of nobility; and as the number of hides of land for which he might be admitted to swear as a compurgator, amounts in quantity to ten knights fees, this vassal was equal to a baron of no mean consideration in Norman times. It does not, however, appear to have ever been a title of nobility, and the word without addition, occurs in the Laws of Cnute for a villein,† which appears to be its signification in the Death of Byrhtnoth, where it is opposed to beorn, a nobleman:—

Byrhtwold mathelode
bord hafenode se wæs eald geneat æsc acwehte
he ful baldlice
beornas lærde.Berthold harangued waving his shield;
he was an old geneat,
he shook the ashen spear and full boldly instructed the nobles.

L. 615.

* By law 15, a person charged with theft might clear himself by oath according to the amount of his were, or pecuniary value of his life, which was one mode of estimating a man's rank in society; and by law 19, a king's geneat, whose were was twelve hundred shillings, might swear in that manner for sixty hides of land.

† Geneat riht, the right of a geneat, is rendered "villani rectum" in the ancient translation of the laws of Cnute. In the laws of Edgar I. geneat land is opposed to thane land, i. e. it was the land of a vassal.

In the Old Saxon and Alamannic laws, on duel, the same term occurs in the acceptation of par, peer or fellow.*

CHAP.
VI.

14. Among the Saxons there was a tenure, called by a name which even in its mixed or Latinized form, denotes in a peculiarly forcible manner the occupation of land under a superior as the meed of warlike services, performed or expected. In ancient records the service of Drengage frequently occurs,† and those from whom it was due were drenches, which the French surveyors employed by the Conqueror to compile Domesday Book, have represented in their aural orthography as drenches,‡ and have thus led to a ridiculous derivation of the term from A.-S. drencan, to drench, as cattle. From that record, it appears that every dreng, was the holder of a manor under the king; he was, therefore, a thane, the equal of a Norman baron. Spelman relates that Edward of Shireburne, and some others, who had been ejected from their lands, repairing to William I. offered to prove that they had never, either before or after the conquest, opposed him in council or aids, but had always held their estates in peace; on which the king caused an inquiry to be made throughout England, and finding their representation to be true, commanded that they should be restored to their lands and lordships, to enjoy them as completely and peaceably as ever they had held them before his conquest, adding that thenceforth they should be called drenches;§ which, indeed, was their Drengage.

* ‘Welk schepenbar vrig man eynen sinen Genoten to kampe ansprehet, he bedarff to weten sine veir anen, und sin hantgemal, und de te benemene: oder dejene weygert eme kampes myt rechte.’—If a freeman equal in rank to a scabinus, challenge his genot, (fellow,) to combat, he must exhibit his four ancestors (prove his descent four degrees) and his usual company, or course of life, or the other may lawfully refuse the duel. See also Jus Alamannic. c. 16, l. ‘Hat aber der tot man ainen magen von sin vater, und wil der mit im kæmpfen, daz mag er mit geuuidern, er si danne sin genæz nit.’—He who kills a relation by the father’s side and will wage duel on it, may refuse if the champion be not his genæz or fellow.

† Testa de Nevill’ passim.

‡ Tit. Cestrescir’, &c.

§ Glossar. p. 184.

CHAP.
VI.

old appellation.* From a passage from an old French historian of the Normans, William Gemetensis, who mistook the words Dreng Got, a valiant dreng, for a surname, the title appears to have been employed in the mediæval sense of the Latin miles, and to have denoted a knight, for the writer having named Osmond, Dreng Got, immediately adds the words, “audax miles,” a bold knight, in perfect ignorance that the addition is a translation of the title.¶ In all probability the term was introduced into England by the Danes, who called any brave man a dren-gur. One of the allegorical sons of Karl, a personification of the agricultural class in Rigs Mal, is called Drengur, the brother of Freeman, Soldier, and others of the more daring members of society. Signifying one that rushes upon the enemy, presses and compels him to submit,‡ it became among the poets the favorite expression for a gallant warrior.§ There is a singular admonitory passage in

* “Et fuit vetus dreyinghe ante conquestum.”—Mon. Angl. t. II, p. 598, et Domesday Boc, supra.

† Tempore Roberti ducis Normanni Osmundus Drengotus audax miles Apuliam cum quibusdam Normannis metu homicidii petiit.—Gul. Gemet. apud Leland, Collect. vol. I, p. 170.

‡ O. N. dhreingia, to compel; A.-S. dhangan, to press, squeeze, throng. Ger. drængen, drengen, same, to crowd, oppress. In like manner, the the Northern reckr, a hero, appears to signify one that drives an enemy before him, from reka. Both terms are very appropriate to a people whose principal occupation was piracy and hostile aggression. The dying Ragnar Lodbrog is feigned to have sung in his Northumbrian dungeon:—

Hiuggum vier med hiorvi	We have hewn with our sword!
hit tel eg iafnt adh gangi	I account it just, in the assault,
at samlogur sverdha	in the meeting of falchions,
sveinn i mote einum	that youth oppose youth,
hrokkve ej thegn fyrer thegn	thane recede not from thane:
thad var dhrengs adhal leingi	that was of old the dreng's nobility.
æ skal astvinur meya	Ever ought the lover of maidens
einardhur i dhyn sverdha.	to be bold in the din of swords.

§ The author of Byrhtnoth represents that hero to have been slain by a dreng, by which he appears to mean one of the foremost in the press of battle:—

Forlet tha sum drenga	Then one of the drengs sent
-----------------------	-----------------------------

the ancient Norwegian Court Laws, which confirms this explanation: "Be mindful of this," says the lawgiver, "that he who dies a coward, will never afterwards be accounted a dreng, because, under what name soever he dieth, by that shall his memory live.* Without doubt, therefore, drengage was one of the feudal services before the conquest, and from the signification of the word, eminently denoting a soldier, it was originally discharged by personal attendance in the field. As to the custom of drengage service, by finding meat and drink for the lord's son, and provender for the lord's dogs and horses, mentioned by Spelman among the aids of John of Gaunt, it belongs to a modern age, and like all other feudal rents and acknowledgments of feudal superiority, it was a commutation of the primary and essential duty of a vassal to act in the military train of his chieftain. The very nature of this commutation is a proof that the meaning of the term was forgotten, and that the French blunder of 'drenches' for 'drenches' had suggested that the office of this description of manorial lords was to drench cattle. A further illustration of this ancient term, may be taken from berewica, the Domesday denomination of a dreng's manor. According to Spelman, the berewic was rather a part of a manor separate from the body, the vill or hamlet of the domain, or a less manor belonging to a greater; for berewics were not situated in the heart of a manor, but on its confines.† If he be right, and there seems no reason to dispute his opinion, the bere-

Berewick.

daroth of handa
fleogan of folman
thæt se to forth gewat
thurh thone æthelan Æthelredes thegen.

the javelin from his hand,
to fly from his grasp,
so that it forth departed through the noble
thane of Athelred.

L. 296.

* "Minzt a that, at sa er einu sinn deyr nidingur, han verdi aldrei odru sinni drengur, thui at med thui naffn sem han deyr, tha verdur med theiri fregn hans minning at lifa."—Norrskra Hirdskraa, c. 19.

† Gloss. p. 79.

CHAP.
VI.

wica of Domesday, is a mistake for beorgwic or bergwic, a place of defence, the particular denomination of the dreng's residence; as hall, a stone building, fortified with moat and turrets, was the name of other manorial seats. With respect to any subsequent degradation of the dreng, by which he held land as a kind of socman, it does not affect the consideration of what he was when first recognized among the feudal tenants of the Anglo Saxons.

Socage.

15. Socman, incidentally noticed above, is a feudal term arising out of the jurisdiction of a Saxon thane, and it denotes a man of the soc, a word which, with orthographic differences, occurs in the same sense, that of a privilege to try causes, in the different Gothic dialects, and in all appears connected with the verb to seek or enquire, investigate. In the laws attributed to the Confessor, under the title of 'Description of various Liberties,'* the soc is mentioned as the privilege of the Saxon nobles both temporal and spiritual, and is defined to be the liberty of judging and determining causes within the precinct of the frithburg or manor.† All others were to repair for this purpose to the king's justiciars; and those who were subject to this jurisdiction were called socmen, which is therefore, manifestly, a synonyme of vassals, of high and low degree. The peculiar duty of him that had the soc was called by the general name of hlaforðsocn, for the protection which was due from the lord to his vassal.‡ The socman however, in Norman times, was considered equivalent to the Saxon ceorl or husbandman.§

* Vide Suprà, p. 156.

† Leges Edw. Conf. c. 22. "Soche est, quod si aliquis querit aliquod in terra sua, etiam furtum, sua est justicia, si inventum fuerit an non."

‡ So "sithesocn," the soc or jurisdiction of a "gesith," companion or count.

§ Sockman; a freeman who holds of the king, or other lord in ancient demense, his lands or villeinage tenements; and he was privileged thus, that none could eject him from his land so long as he performed the services due for it, or compel him to do more than he was bound. In the Anglo-Norman laws, the ceorl of the Saxons is often rendered sockman."—Gloss. to Ancient Laws.

16. That other vestiges of feodality may be discerned, or on close examination of forensic terms be detected, among the remains of the Anglo Saxons, is exceedingly probable; but since the people possessed all the principal incidents of military tenure, and like the Scandinavians were completely free from Roman influence, it will be somewhat difficult to believe that their institutions had any, the most remote connection, with the peculiarities of a people in every respect widely dissimilar. As they did not erect corporations and municipalities in the territories which they acquired by their swords, they were obliged to maintain possession in the same manner. The question as to the existence of the feudal system among any ancient people, contracts itself within less compass than a nutshell, for they who subsisted by rapine, or lived in the neighbourhood of depredators, or extended their territories by conquest, knew no other form of government. Military tenure and all that belonged to it, originated in warfare, and began to decay as soon as civilization, fostered by commerce, created new wants, and the necessity of supplying them gave birth to an order of men, before whom the power of the feudal baron has vanished, leaving titles of lost import, and privileges which must perish in the progress of the silent revolution, that having enfranchised the middle classes daily comprehends the lower. The aristocracy of wealth must destroy the aristocracy of birth, which is valuable only as it stands in public estimation; but whether the man of trade and manufacture, who now takes the station of the feudal baron, as unencumbered by his duties as uncheered by the attachment of dependents, will be equally beneficent to society, is to be seen.

17. It is generally said that the era of formally introducing the feudal tenures by law was probably the latter end of the year 1086, when the king was attended by all his nobility at Sarum, where all the principal landholders submitted their land to the yoke of military tenure, and became the king's vassals. This engraftment of the feudal

Norman Tenures.

CHAP.
VI.

tenures and other customs of Normandy upon the ancient Saxon laws, produced a different political system in this country, and changed both power and property in many respects, for those hereditary estates of the Saxon nobility and gentry which were allodial, and not subject to any feudal service, were converted into feods, and other lands which were of a feudal nature and held by military service, having been granted only at will or for a certain term of years, or at most for life or lives, and the grants of which were called benefices, were made hereditary fiefs.

*Grand
and Petit Serjeanty.*

18. After the preceding proofs of the existence of the Feodal System in England from the Anglo Saxon Laws, it is evident that William did little more than adopt it, giving the new names of grand and petit serjeanty, or great and small service, to feudal duties of the royal or ordinary thanes, who were thenceforth denominated barons. "Thus," says St. Amand, "if land were given for the service of the steward, constable, chamberlain or marshall of England, such gift and service created a grand serjeanty; but if for service of the household, master of the horse or chamberlain of the household, these respecting only the service of the king, and not the public; such services as they created no tenure of the public, so did they, as I conceive, make only a tenure of petit serjeanty."* All these officers were known to the Saxons to the earliest times, and were supported by the only means in the power of the state or the king, the lands on which they lived. It is exceedingly probable that the feudal system varied in minor respects with the varying customs of different people. The general nature of the tenures in France would be the same as in Denmark, but varieties would arise with circumstances, and when the Northmen settled in France an amalgamation might take place, and produce a system not resembling the German, Italian, Spanish, or Saxon systems. The latter, as having been less affected by the customs of the Britons and Roman Britons, who were nearly extirpated by the conquerors, must be considered the oldest form of feodality, and to have subsisted without innovation until the Normans brought their Frankish and Danish compound. What pre-existed they adopted.*

* Histor. Essay on Legislat. Power of England, p. 73.

19. The same judicious writer has the following synopsis of the alterations made by the Normans: "The army the Conqueror brought with him was too weak to keep the English in an unwilling obedience, and yet much less able to do so, when many of them returned, a year after the invasion, to their native France; hence the Conqueror probably sensible, that it could not be the interest of the minority to keep up distinctions, acted on a view of consolidating both the English and French into one people, and for this purpose introduced here wardships and marriages.† On the same motive it is highly probable, he did not subvert or dissolve the Saxon government, but adapted the rewards of his fellow adventurers to their constitution, and left the Saxon earls as in their institution officary, and the counties under their administration, but undermined the power he could not safely destroy, by dismembering the barons estates in a manner from the counties, and making them recognize no superior but the crown.

"The Conqueror gave part of the land that he retained to himself under the reservation of military service, to his own immediate followers; so did his confederates, who, holding their lands by the service of a determined number of soldiers,‡ enfeoffed their own immediate followers with some portion of what was assigned to them for their share, under reservation of such service. These lands so given

* See the preamble to the Laws of the Conqueror, p. 156, note †.

† But see p. 152, suprà.

‡ We have no trace of this in the Saxon laws, and yet since it was an established custom among the Northern nations, (See Harald Harfagre's provincial laws, in his Saga, p. 78,) it must have been known, at all events, in our Danish reigns.

CHAP.
VI.

Knight's
Fees.

were called Knights Fees; and it is highly probable that the Conqueror and his associates did compel many of the old English to hold their ancient possessions by the same tenure, the number of them exceeding sixty thousand. As they all agreed in the creating of knights fees, so did they in one uniform manner divide, or, which I think more probable, continue the division of the residue of their possessions in the same manner as the Saxons used; some part they retained in their own hands, other part was allotted to husbandmen in lieu of hire; for as narrow as their commerce was, they had not money enough to answer its occasions. These were to till and manure such portions as they retained in their own hands, and were called Tenants in Soccage, a word which signifies the service of the plough; and properly were they so termed, since till Henry the Second's* time they actually performed that service; then indeed money became more plentiful, and as the reason for the institution of that service was thereby gone, the service itself vanished, and in lieu of it have ever since paid a rent; the residue was either left to the occupation of the bondmen, or, lying neglected, was called the Waste."†

* Hale, of Sheriffs Accounts, p. 14.

† Bacon's Elements of the Law, 30. St. Amand, Histor. Essay, p. 73, 4. The service performed by a tenant in socage was what is described, but it is not the meaning of the word, as asserted in English law books. The soc was the Saxon manor, and the socman, a tenant upon that manor; and of necessity there were several grades of socmen, from the guma (whence yeoman or free tenant), to the theow or serf. In the reign of Henry I. man was added to the latter word, and the serf, "glebæ adscriptus," was called thu-man, as it is found in the Chronicle of Robert of Gloucester, who, speaking of the laws enacted by this prince, says:—

"He drou to rigte lawe mani luther custome.
Sein Tomas hom withsede and granted some.
The lawes, that icholle nou telle, he graunted vawe.
Guf a thuman hath a sone to clergie idrawe
He ne sal, withoute is louerdes (will) icrouned be Vor thuman ne may nought be imad agen is louerdes wille fre.

P. 470.

Selden injudiciously reads yuman, and Hearne as inaccurately explains thuman to be "yeoman, common man." A yeoman was not a common man, but a free vassal, and the thuman was not free. In Teutonic etymology GUMA=HOMO Latin; and in Beowulf dryhtguma is "comes," a geneat or gesidh, a feudal vassal, the companion of his lord. The Foreign Quarterly Reviewer connects guma with Goth. gaumjan, A.-S. gyman, to observe, take care of, watch; and if he be right, yeoman corresponds with the Slavonic title czar, a watchman, which appears to have been adopted in the modern German kaiser, an emperor. "I call him a yeoman," says Smith, in his Commonwealth (b. I, c. 23.), "whom our laws doe call legalem hominem, a word familiar in writs and enquests, who is freeman born, and may dispend of his owne free land in yeerely revenue the summe of xls. sterling." In all old writers yeoman is invariably considered to be a proprietor; and originally he may have been a farmer or cattle feeder. The resemblance of the word to the Sanskrit goman, a possessor of cattle, and particularly of cows, throws considerable doubt upon the suggested connection with the Gothic gaumjan. Besides, we know that groom is a derivative of guma, and the latter would scarcely give another word so widely different from both as yeoman. It may also be observed that as groom is not grooman, so yeoman is not yeom, as it would probably be if guma were the etymon. The Scottish writers employed groom in a military sense: and in the poem of Wallace, groyme is a warrior:—

"The worthi Scottis the dry land than has tayne Apon the laiff fechtand full wondyr fast,
And moni groyme thei mad full sor agast."

In Gower's old English, grome is a servant:—

"——Every man shall take his dome,
As wele the mayster as the grome."

Confess. Am. apud Jamieson, Etym. Dict. in v.

Yeoman.

Groom.

CHAPTER VII.

Titles of the possessors of supreme authority.

- 1.—Nobles, edelings, athelings, libertines. 2.—Youths, juvenes, knights; Ignobles. 3.—Signification of the termination -ing, -inus, &c.; Lordings. 4.—Lassi, handicraftsmen; theows and thumen. 5.—Rex. 6.—The manner in which all titles and appellations originally came to be applied, adopted, and generally used. 7.—Titles of Sovereigns. 8.—Diar. 9.—Aldor, a rex. 10.—Rex same as rakshi and reg-, as raja. Brahmanic derivation. 11.—Thiudans, a king; the title of Theodoric. 12.—Theoden, a lord. 13.—Judge, a military title; doomers. 14.—Rectors. 15.—Terms for kingdom mostly denote power or people, not territory. 16.—KING; importance of the etymology. 17.—Hendinos, in old Burgundian, a king; the same word as the Latin centenus. 18.—Kindins, Gothic, the same as hendinos. 19.—Cyning, a king, derived from cyn. 20.—Synonymes of king. 21.—Its true etymon. 22.—Hunnones and hundreders. 23.—Multitude of kings. 24.—Mistakes as to the splendour of the rank. 25.—DUKE. 26.—Hofding, Captain. 27.—Kings turned to jarls. 28.—QUEEN, Drottinn, Lady, Dame, Frau. 29.—Chieftain, hofding, captain. 30.—Prince. 31.—Atheling. 32.—Earl. 33.—Viscount.

CHAP.
VII.Orders of Society.

1. In every community, whether its government be monarchical or republican, there must necessarily exist three principal classes of people, the higher, middle and lower, and each contain its subdivision in like manner. Where there is any competition, there can be no equality of condition. Of all people, ancient or modern, the Germans described by Tacitus seem to have possessed the greatest equality of civil rights, but they were subject to this law of society. There are commonly said to have been distinguished four classes among this people, the nobiles, ingenui, liberti, and servi,* but on closer examination it will be found that he has described only three. In the thirteenth chapter of his Germany, he speaks of the principes, who were the aldoras or chieftains, their comites or comrades, and the juvenes, or knechten, youths or knights, just as the chiefs of the Red Indians are described to be attended by their warriors and "young men." These are also manifestly official persons, and answering to the dignity-men of the Northern tribes.* As birth was a necessary qualification, such men were generally termed by the Germans, adalings, edelings, or edhelings, connected with the Gothic atta, a father, and literally corresponding with the patricii, men of birth of the Romans. As every German citizen was entitled to bear arms, he was a freeman, and this is what appears to be the meaning of ingenuus, free born, in the fourfold divisions. Having mentioned freemen who lost their liberty by gambling, he says, "The rest of their slaves they do not use according to our custom, with particular offices marked out for them through the family. Each manages his own habitation and his own household."† The Roman term servi, is therefore, inapplicable to this class. They were not freemen, but they were not slaves, and were eligible to the class of freemen, by the presentation of arms. The freedmen he calls libertini, and says that they are not much superior to slaves, and seldom have any weight in the family, never in the state, except only in those states which are governed by kings. For there they gain the ascendancy both above the freeborn, and above the nobles; among the rest, the unequal condition of freemen is a proof of liberty.

* Schildius, de Caucis et alii.

2. In the fourth century Ammianus repeatedly mentions the juvenes or knights, and two centuries afterwards Jor-

*Youths, Juvenes,
or Knights.*

nandes speaks of a second order of nobility,‡ by which he probably distinguishes the class of juvenes from that of comites. Witechind and Nithard, three centuries after the

* Tignarmenn, men of title; but the word tiginn, noble, corresponds with the Latin dign-us, worthy.

† C. 25.

‡ De Rebus Geticis, c. 29.

CHAP.
VII.

Ignobiles.

Edlingi or Athelings.The Indo-European termination -in-g is not the sign of a patronymic

historian of the Goths, perfectly concide in their manner of enumerating the divisions of the Saxons. The former finds among them three orders, besides that of serfs,* and the latter says that this people consists of three ranks, called edlingi, frilingi, and lassi, answering in Latin to nobiles, ingenui, and serviles.† Adam of Bremen, in the eleventh century, distinguishes four classes among the same people, the nobiles, liberi or freemen, the liberti, the freedmen, and the servi or serfs.‡ The lassi of Nithard included the Bremen historian's liberti and servi, and consequently Witechind's people of servile condition.§

3. The Edlingi are those nobles whom Paul Warnefrid more correctly terms adelingi, a word immediately springing from adel, edel, ethel and ethli, which in O. German, Norse, and Anglo-Saxon, signifies a race or family, and which, like the cognate terms ödal and ödhal, already noticed in connexion with the Gothic atta, a father, is a derivative from the Sanskrit root AD, to eat. A mistake with respect to the import of the common termination -ing, has led to an erroneous explanation of the whole term adeling, (belonging to a family) a man of birth, by which it is made to signify a second or inferior order of nobility. This termination, with slight variations according to the genius of the language, is common to Indo-European dialects. In fact it is the Sanskrit termination -in, which communicates a denominative, attributive or possessive signification to its subject; as for instance, jnan, wisdom, is converted into jnanin, possessed of wisdom; hala, a plough, halin, con-

* Gens Saxonica triformi genere ac lege, præter conditionem servilem, dividitur.—Annal. l. I, c. 1.

† Quæ gens omnis tribus ordinibus divisa consistit. Sunt enim inter eos, qui Edlingi, sunt qui Frilingi, sunt qui Lassi, illorum lingua dicuntur. Latina vero lingua hoc sunt, nobiles, ingenui, atque serviles.—L. IV, c. 5.

‡ Quatuor differentiis gens illa consistit, nobilium scilicet et liberorum, libertorumque atque servorum.—L. I, c. 5.

§ "Liber et servus" are the only distinctions in the old laws of the Angles and Thuringians, on homicides.

nected with a plough; and so of a vast multitude of words. It is, as before intimated, the parent of the Greek -einos, Lat. -inus, and Goth, -ins. In the Scandinavian, A.-Saxon and Germanic tongues, a g appears for the s. Ing in the Saxon word cyning, has been regarded as the sign of a patronymic, because it is found in such expressions as "Penda wæs Wybbing. Wybba Cryding," and translated, correctly enough as to historical fact, but inaccurately as to verbal import, "Penda was the son of Wybba, Wybbe the son of Cryda." But the grammatical sense is no more than "Penda was (a) Wybbine, Wybba was (a) Crydine," by which Penda and Wybba were sufficiently distinguished from all other persons of the same name.* In Latin, in-us converts names of places into personal appellation, as from Salonæ is made Saloninus, and in all cases it intimates a connection between the word so terminated and its etymon: thus Lars or Lara, gives Larina; leo, leoninus; ursus, ursinus, &c. So from bär, a bear, come the names Behring and Baring, equivalent to the Italian Orsini, from orso, Lat. ursus, a bear; and it might be exactly represented in English by Bearing or Bearine. Bunting, a common surname, is bonding, of the quality of a bondi or husbandman; and in like manner the Norw. bandingi, a prisoner, from band, a ligature, becomes Bentinck. The old Swedish drottning, a queen, is formed from drottinn, a lord, a sovereign, just as in Latin, regina is formed from rege, and in Sanskrit rajni, a queen, from raja, a king. In the same way, the old English lordine, corruptly lourdan or lordane, may be explained, though in still older language the original termination was unaltered: louerdynge, means no other than lordines, men of the quality of lords, or worthy of thegn-right. Thus are styled several persons, who

* Grammatically there is not the slightest difference between Carolingi and Carolini, or Carlovingi and Carlovinci, if there be such a word. The "Libri Carolini" are not the books of the son of Charles, but the Caroline books.

CHAP. VII. had not been summoned to parliament as barons, and who were taken prisoners in 1265, at the battle or—

—“ morthre of Eiuesham; vor bataile non it uas.”

“ Louerdinges ther were inome of Evesham mani:
As Sire Unfrai de Boun, Sir Jon le fiz Jon,
And Simondes sone de Mountfort Sire Gwy,
Sire Baudewine de Wake, sire Jon de Vesey,
Sire Henri de Hastings, and Sire Nicole iwis
De Segrave was there inome, & al so sire Peris
And Sire Roberd that Sire Peris de Mountfort sones were Thuse & wel mo were in thulke morthre there.”*

Lassi, liti, or læti.

4. Lassi is one of three terms applied to the lowest or servile class, not absolutely slaves. Liti, in continental Latinity, and læt in Anglo-Saxon, appear to denote little; but lass or lassi, in the Latin plural, is a Sanskrit term for handycraft work; these were, therefore, the tradesmen and artizans, while liti and læti seem to answer to the “small commons” of our old laws, where they treat of villeins and labourers;† the theows of the Saxons, and thumen of the English, filling up the remainder as slaves.

*Theows &
thumen.*

* Robert of Gloucester, p. 560.

† The following extracts seem to confirm this explanation. Liti occurs in a charter of the Lady Williswind, and her son Cancro, count of Hagenheim, in the 12th year of Pepin, or 764, in an enumeration of lands, houses, goods and chattels, “farinariis, litis, libertis, conlibertis, mancipiis, mobilibus et immobilibus, peculio utriusque sexus,” &c.—Chron. Laurisham. p. 56. In a grant of privileges to Adalgagus, archbishop of Bremen, by Otho, in 977, a female lit is granted with her children and their future offspring, “Donamus etiam ad hæc præfato archiepiscopo interventu Bernhardi ducis quædam nostri juris mancipia, litam, viz. Thietsniden dictam, cum filiis ejus et filiabus omnique progenie, quæ ex his per successura tempora fuerit procreata.”—Apud Schild. de Caucis, l. I, c. 13. By the Saxon laws, the lord was to give satisfaction for whatever the litus did by his command: “Quidquid servus aut litus jubente domino perpetraverit, dominus emendet.”—Tit. 10, s. 1. The litus, although he could be given away with the land, was not a slave, as appears by the distinction “servus aut litus.” A Frisian law contemplates the redemption with his own money, of a litus from his master: “Si litus semetipsum propria pecunia a domino suo redimerit.”—L. Frisior. tit. 11; and L. Ripuar. tit. 64, explains him to be a tributarius, by which evidently must be understood,

5. If the adelings held no office, they had no title, and therefore did not properly come under the denomination of men of rank and dignity, the tignarmen of the northern nations. All titles denoting rank are the appellations of offices, and hence there will be little difficulty in ascertaining what the greater part were in their origin. It seems, however, necessary to state a reason for rejecting all derivations of ancient titles in primitive languages from foreign sources, although that process has been usually adopted, and its results have been generally received as satisfactory. When Postel maintains that the Latin rex is derived from the Hebrew rosch, a head, a chief; and others, now living, insist that the Anglo-Saxon cyning, (English, king,) is derived from the Irish ceann, a head, a chief, they are deceived by a resemblance in orthography, and take a secondary or derivative meaning of rex and cyning, for the primary one annexed to their false etymons. The utter improbability of a communication between the first race of Sakasens and the Irish, and between Romakas and the Jews, who had most likely never heard of each other, is evident when we consider that the Latin word which, in the oblique cases, corresponds with the Sanskrit raja, a king, answers to the Scythian reix, a chief, the Gothic reiks, a prince, and the Norse rekkr, a hero, and that the Anglo-Saxon word, in a variety of forms, is found all over Europe, north of the Danube, and even in Livonia. Each class has derived from one common source, whatever that may have been, and in their respective dialects are original or archaic for every purpose of inquiry.

6. If the Sakasens, of whom the present inhabitants of Europe, who have descended from the Roman, German, Origin of one who managed his own household, paid a portion of the produce from the land allowed for his use, and was disposed of along with his owner's estate. Litti, lassi, and lazzi have been thought adjectives (little, less, least), with a Latin termination. See the Glossary to the Ancient Laws and Instit. of England, in explanation of the "terræ læticæ," and the læt of the Laws of Ethelbert.
Titles,

CHAP.
VII.

and their universal application

and Norse tribes, must be considered the lineal representatives, came into Europe in an orderly manner, peaceable or warlike, they must have had chiefs, with their subordinate officers, and all distinguished by appellations corresponding to their functions. The manner in which these appellations, whether originating in Asia or Europe, arose and became general among the people, must have been the same as the process of giving a name to a trade or profession. The people, for instance, observing a man frequently engaged in pouring out molten metal, would call him geotere, or fusor, the pourer; or, if a man were to devote his time to the preparation of flesh for food, they would call him the flesher or fleshmonger, or creourgos or carnifex, according to the language; and in process of time these names would be the general appellations of the trades among those people by whom the appellations were understood.* That this is the process by which the name of the trade is fixed unalterably to the profession, is proved by the fact that the circumstance or operation is not noticed by all people alike. Thus the Gothic nations observing the armourer frequently striking hot iron with his hammer, called him smith, the smiter; the Romans, looking to the result of his labour, called him faber, the artist or maker; the Greeks, seeing that he busied himself chiefly about brass and copper, named him chalkeus, just as others called him a forgemaster because they saw him work in iron. A man addicted himself to a particular occupation before a name was given to it, and he himself would not be the author of the name, but the people who wanted his services, who talked about him, and who inquired after him. Thus a term known at first only to a few, became general, and was finally adopted by the common consent of the people, as the distinctive appellation of the office which it described. It seems absurd to suppose that titles originated with the chiefs;—

* Several names of occupations, resulting from modern inventions and improvements, are instances, as postman, lamplighter, stoker, &c.

that, for instance, a chief would say to his follower, you shall take care of my bottles, and be called the king's bottler or butler; to another, you shall command my army, and be called herzog; to a third, you shall guard a distant province, and be called an old man, (the common derivation of alderman) or an honourable man, (the usual derivation of earl); to a fourth, you shall be my chief glory as a fighting man about my person, and be called a boy: yet this is the process which alone will account for the origin of titles as given by writers who forget that the source of all words, and of all honour to be paid to them, is the common understanding and appreciation of the people. If instead of smith, the smiter, the Gothic nations had gone to the Latin and borrowed percussor in the first instance, that term would have been known only to the few by whom it was imported, and it would never have become general, because it conveyed no idea whatever to the bulk of the people. In short, it is little better than downright nonsense to look in ancient languages for derivatives from foreign sources. People who were at little peace among themselves, and in constant warfare with their neighbours, and who possessed, as all the Gothic nations did, dialects more copious than Latin, and equal to the Greek in facility and strength of combinations, never rendered themselves debtors for their household words.

7. The Saxon aldor, the Gothic fads, Sanskrit pati, and the Latin pater have been shewn to correspond in a radical meaning, that of sustaining and supporting the people dependent upon them, and there can be no doubt that the last, at least, was given by the people to their chief from analogy observed between his duty and that of a father. The Gothic *fadh*s or fads occurs in connexion with people only in the compounds hundafads and *thusundifadh*s, supporter of a hundred, supporter of a thousand; but aldor and pater were not so restricted, and yet it is probable from history that they were only the chiefs of the hordes, tribes, or clans, into which their nations were divided.

Titles of Sovereigns.

CHAP.
VII.

Drottning,
Danish & Swedish title of Queen.

Beda tells us that the ancient Saxons had no kings, but many "Satrapæ," and that in time of war, they united together, when the "Satrapæ" elected a leader whom they obeyed so long as the occasion demanded the continuance of this alliance. In Rome, being continually engaged in war, the patres formed themselves into a perpetual council, and elected a perpetual chief called a rex. By what name the Saxons termed their temporary war-chief, cannot be certainly known. Cæsar calls him a magistrate among the Belgians, and Tacitus mentions both dux and rex among the leaders of other nations. There is, however, an ancient title of high nobility, which seems descriptive of the office of one who draws a multitude together from all sides, or, which is nearly the same thing, who commands a multitude collected from all quarters. The Goths called soldiers ga-drauhteis; the Anglo-Saxons named a lord dryhten, which corresponds to the ancient German druhten, druten, and truhien, and to the ancient Norse drottinn, which it is affirmed preceded the title of king of Scandinavia,* and of which drottning, the present Danish and Swedish term for their queen, is the memorial.† With respect to the etymology of this very antient title, we are told that drottin comes from drött, a family, as Gothic thiudans, a king, from thiuda, people; but drött does not account for the Saxon and German words, and besides, is itself in want of an explanation. This example shews the insufficiency of trusting to etymologies founded upon the observation of coincidences in a single language. Omitting

* "Dyggvi var fyrstur kongur kalladhur sinna ættmanna, enn adhur voru their drotnar kalladher, enn konor theirra drottningar, enn drott hirdhveitinn." Dyggvi was the first of his family called a king: previously they were called lords, their queens, ladies, and their household a drott.—Ynglinga Saga, c. 20.

† The Fins call it drotning. In an old Danish record of deaths, printed in Langbeke's collection, we have the obit of "Dronnyng Margrete, konnyng Waldemars dottir."—Script. Rer. Dan. t. IV, p. 323. The former is regularly formed, but dronnyng must be a mere provincialism.

the common prefix and termination of the Gothic ga-drauhteis, we obtain drauht, etymologically equivalent to dryht, truht, and drött, for the Gothic $AU=O=U=Y$. The Gothic drauht-eis appears to correspond with the Latin tract-us; and Norse verb draga, A.-S. dragan, O. H. G. tragen, Lithuanian traukti, equally answer to the Latin trahere, to draw. These words are all referable to the Sanskrit draghitum, to labour, to draw out, to be strong; and drottinn, dryhten, druhtin, a lord, will denote a powerful person at the head of the gadrauhteis, the drott, or the (A.-S.) gedryht, company of persons drawn together. That one of these terms was the title given to the chiefs who assembled the different hordes of Asiatics in their earliest invasions of Europe, seems to be quite within the bounds of probability. It was a regal title in Scandinavia, and is also so used by Ottfried. In the Anglo-Saxon gospels and homilies it is usually attributed to Jesus Christ, while in Beowulf, it is a frequent epithet of royal, or at least princely personages. To these considerations may be added what has just been noticed, that it still subsists in the Danish, Swedish, and Icelandic name of a queen.* Its disuse as a military term among the Saxons and Germans might be accounted for by the more obvious signification of heretoga, army leader, which was better adapted for common acceptance.

8. These lords, the earliest sovereigns of the country, were also called Diar, who presided over sacrifices, and the Diar.

* As a matter of curiosity, it may be noticed that the word drygt lingered in English poetry down to the twelfth or thirteenth century:—

I beleve in oure holy drygt Fader of hevene, god almygt.

Cott. MS. Claud. A. 11, fo. 132.

The term draught is still used in the army, and those who are draughted from one regiment to another, would anciently have been called a gedryht:

Thær Hrodhgar sæt eald unhar mid his eorla gedryht.	There Roger sate, the old hairless one, with his group of warriors.
--	--

Beowulf, 710.

CHAP.
VII.

judgments of their people.* They were, therefore, priests and judges, as well as rulers, and, in this respect, corresponded with the reges of the south:—

“Rex Anius, rex idem hominum, Plœbique sacerdos.”†

That this is the signification of the plural word di-ar (= di-i Latin) will appear by correcting a mistake in the copies of Jornandes. Among the Getæ, he says, there were some priests called pii, which it is evident was originally written pui, thui, or dhui, just as in the old printed copies of Cnute’s Forest Laws, “pegni” appears for þegni, thanes. It is remarkable that in the Mexican language, di is a great lord, and that in this sense it is still used in the dialect of St. Kilda, where old Norse words abound. The identity of the Greek theoi, Lat. dii, and this dhia or diar cannot be doubted, though the significations are so far different, that we nowhere find the German princes setting up a pretence to divinity. All these terms correspond with the Sanskrit devah, a God, from div, the sky.

Aldor,
or rex.

9. There appear to have been among the early nations of Europe several designations of the supreme ruler; and Tacitus mentions that some of the states were not governed by reges.‡ This is the word which king Alfred renders cyningas, kings, in his translation of the passage in Bede, where that writer observes that the old Saxons had no kings, but satrapas, or aldormen according to Alfred. Aldor or aldorman and cyning, are therefore, titles of the supreme governor, and both, are, in all probability, expressed by the Latin rex, which appears to be the pure Sanskrit rakshi, a king, from raksh, to preserve, to nourish, and thus it agrees in the radical signification with aldor and pater.

Rex the

10. Rakshi or rex corresponds with the Gothic reiks, O.

* Their radha fyrer blotum ok domum manna imille: that ero diar kalladhir, edhur drottmar.—Ynglinga Saga, c. 2.

† Virg. Æn. III, 80.

‡ De Mor. Germ. c. 25.

Prussian rykis;* but the oblique cases of rex seem referable to the Sanskrit raja, a king, of which there is a very ancient etymology by a native writer before the commencement of the Christian era: "The mighty Prithu, the son of Vena, being thus invested with universal dominion by those who were skilled in the rite, soon removed the grievances of the people whom his father had oppressed, and from winning their affections, he derived the title of Raja or king."† The word referred to is raga, passion, affection, which since it denotes neither personal quality, nor duty, nor aptitude for the office, is not a very probable etymon of the title. Grammarians do not approve of it, but on the contrary, judging on the principle of external resemblance, they propose the verbal root raj, shine, which it is very unlikely a whole people would fix upon to denominate a ruler, who had duties to perform. As there is a disagreement among natives on the subject, we are at liberty to reject either of these derivations, or both, and there is less presumption in suggesting another, particularly if it should be conformable to what is observed in the origin of other titles, and if it should agree with the peculiar signification of some of the cognates. If a Brahman can believe that raja was formed from raga, there is a possibility that it may have been derived from ragh, to be powerful, and ragha or raja, will signify literally, a powerful man, a hero, and so the leader of warriors.

same as rakshi, and reg-e as raja.

Brahmanic derivation.

"Rex," says the Foreign Quarterly Reviewer of Prof. Jäkel, "connects itself no doubt with ῥεγω, rectus, A.-Sax. reccean, &c. with the English rich, Spanish rico, wealthy, powerful, (a Gothic word), as seen in their ricos hombres, i. e. nobles; with the Gothic ragineis, a councillor, and many other words. The original acceptation seems to be extension." Two classes of words seem here to be con-

* That is (x=ks) raksh-i = rek-s = reik-s = ryk-is. Of rakshi, the root is raksh, to preserve, to nourish: i, s, and is, are grammatical syllables.

† Vishnu Purana, c. xiii. p. 101, 2. By Mr. H. H. Wilson.

CHAP.
VII.

founded. The English rich, Fr. riche, A.-S. rice, Span. rico, and Norse rikr, powerful or rich, are obvious cognates of the Sanskrit riktham, wealth, goods, which with rag, explained swadaptyoh, in taste, gain, acquisition, and so on, is very unsatisfactorily referred to rich, to separate, and to rich, to praise. Ragh, the immediate root of raja, rex, recke, is probably a derivative of rag, the root of rich, rico, rikr. Reccean, to reach, is connected with A.-S. reccan, to care for, O. Germ. rechen, to act, and O. Norse reka, to agitate, drive forth. In the first, we see a correspondence with the Latin regere, to govern, and in the two latter, the reason of its being applied to heroes, the commanders of armies.* Sa reiks this fairhwaus, is the Gothic version of 'the prince of this world,' in the Gospel of St. John:† in Norse, rekr was merely the epithet of a prince, and in ancient German, rechen seems to have been a name given, as Goldastus thinks, to such brave men as defended the people from the attacks of enemies and incursions of robbers, or were governors of districts, cities, or only castles.‡ This opinion receives strength from the meaning of the Anglo Saxon reccere, and from the fact, that it has not appeared among the German nations as a title of their supreme rulers. It is found in this sense only in Rome, in the form of rex, and in its provinces on the Continent. Though frequently used by Cæsar and Tacitus in speaking of the Belgic and German sovereigns, there is no reason to suppose that any of them bore the appellation as their official title.

Thiudans, probably the title of Theodoric
the Goth.

11. Procopius, speaking of Theodoric after he assumed the sceptre of Italy, says, that in governing the Goths and Italians he used neither the ensigns nor titles of the Roman empire.§ On this Sperling observes, that the title which Theodoric assumed is not stated by Procopius or any other

* 'Landræcke, thar hann rekur her sinn umm lond.'—He is called the rekr of the country, when he conducts his army through the land.—Snorro's Edda.

† Chap. xii, 31.

‡ In Animadv. ad Script. Parenæt. p. 362, apud Wachter, v. Recken.

§ De Bello Goth. l. I.

writer; and the learned Dane thinks that it must have been thiudans, a king, from thiudo (thiuda) people, because that word is used in the Gothic Gospel to represent rex.* In support of his opinion he adduces two passages from the Havamal and the History of Hervor, which however, prove no more than the existence of thiodann, the epithet of a prince or lord, in ancient Scandinavian literature.† Yet since the word is found in all the dialects, since the Germanic nations were particularly known as the Teutish, (now the Deutsch, Dutch), or Teutonic, and since diet, in English, preserves the name of their national assemblies or councils of states,‡ it is exceedingly probable that it was a regal title among other people than merely the Goths. From the expression of Procopius, that the title adopted by Theodoric was the name of empire, nothing is collected that proves more for thiudans than for reiks. The Goths had both thiudangardi, thiudanassus and reiki, as the name of kingdom; and while the compounds are not to be found elsewhere, reiki is obvious in the Anglo-Saxon rice, the Norse, riki, and the German reich, and affords a reason, as before stated, for believing that the corresponding word was used as an officary title. Diet.

* De Summo Regio Nomine, Konung, Sect. 3, p. 38.—‘Hails thiudan Iudaie!’—Hail, king of the Jews!—Mar. xv. 13.

† This is manifest from the passages themselves; ‘Liod eg than kan er kannat thiodans kona oc manskis megur.’—I know the lay, which the prince’s wife and the son of nobody, know not.—Hav. c. 9. ‘Thiggia af thiodan,’ (in Herv. c. 17,) ‘to accept of you, prince,’ will not bear a more particular construction of the word.

‡ In Alam. or O. Germ. diet, a great crowd: diète, Fr. from the Frank, diette; but O. Eng. dyot is nearer the older or Gothic orthography, thiuda, gens, natio, and prevents any mistake as to its import. The king of Rome “hath sent Gusman, one of the cheefe aboute him, to th’emperor to exhort him to attend the dyot in some place of Germanie, for the quittance of the same, which as yet hath had no advice.”—Lodge, Illustr. of Brit. Hist. v. I. p. 170, quoted in Dr. Richardson’s Etymol. Dict. v. diet. Du Cange assigns the very jejune reason for the name dyeta, deducing it from the Latin dies, that these assemblies were so called because they sat but one day.

CHAP.
VII.

12. We see the sense of the Anglo-Saxon theoden in numerous passages of poetry:—

Theoden.

Wille ic asecgan
sunu Healfdenes mærum theodne min ærende aldre thinum.

Beowulf, 685.

I will tell my errand
to the son of Halfdane,
the illustrious prince,
thy king.

Kemble.

It is an epithet of aldor which is here used as the synonyme of cyning, a king, in other places given to Roger as his proper title. With respect to the etymological import or radical conception of the word, thiudans in Gothic appears to be connected with thiutheigs, good, according to the notions of primitive and warlike people, strong, courageous and valiant. The Gothic thiudans, a king, finds its etymological equivalent in the Latin tutans and tutor, a protector, defender, and in like manner the following are connected with their own verbs, and with each other: A.-S. thyhtig, stout, valiant, from theon, to be able, which makes pres. plu. in thugon; hence dugan, to be able, = duga Icelandic, = duer Dan. to be able; Germ. deihen, to prosper; A.-S. dugoth, virtue, nobility; Icelandic dygd, virtue; A.-S. dohtig; New Germ. tüchtig, able, fit; O. Engl. dogtie, doughty, noble, valiant:—

In Rome was a dogty man,
That was y called Eufemain,
Man of moche mygte;
Gold and selver he hadde ynoug,
Hall and boures, oxse and ploug
And swithe wel to dygte.*

If any people besides the Goths had employed this word, which expresses no duty or office in its radical import, but is well adapted for an epithet, we should scarcely find such phrases as theodcyning,* thiodkongur,† &c. to denote an independent king; and these are very common.

* Metrical Lives of Saints. Wharton, Hist. Poet. v. III, p. 11, 12.

Judges.

13. Though it is impossible to decide the question raised by Sperling, with respect to the title assumed by Theodoric, it may be observed, one of its conditions is, that the actual word was a barbaric term of power and command. There were two ancient words expressive of power, and both synonymous with monarch. The Alani, says Ammianus, know no servitude, being of a generous stock: they elect judges, skilled by daily experience in the art of war;‡ and he calls the Gothic conqueror Athanaric, the learned judge of the Thervingi.§ Both the Greeks and Romans were delighted with the title chosen by this prince, as appears from the address of the orator Themistius, to the emperor Valens: "He is not so much a barbarian in disposition as in language, and is of much greater ability in understanding and prudence than arms. He, therefore, repudiates the name of king, and takes that of Judge; for the former is significant of power, while the latter is attributed to prudence and wisdom."|| But the first meaning of Judge, (judic-are, to judge; judex, a judge, Lat.) is connected with the art of war, and appears referable for an origin to the Sanskrit yudh, fight, whence ayudha, a weapon, and ayudhika, living by arms. The title of Theodoric denoted power; that of Athanaric, wisdom. Among all the descendants of the Barbarian conquerors, the word dom bears the former signification. Domari, in Old Norse, domere A.-S., and doomer or demster in English, are what we now

* In gear dagum theod cyninga
thrym gefrunon.

We have learned the majesty of kings in days of yore.

Beowulf, 2.

† 'Ei ma jall thiod kong kalla than skattgelldur er.'—Never may a jarl who is tributary be called a great or independent sovereign.—Snor. Edda.

‡ Judices etiam nunc eligunt, diuturno bellandi usu spectatos.—Lib. xxxi, c. 2. p. 478.

§ Doctus Athanaricus Thervingorum judex.—Ib. c. 3, p. 479.

|| Orat. 10, ad Valentem. Gronov. in notis ad Ammian.

CHAP.
VII.Doomers.

call a judge, though the word doom, or doomer, has a more awful import than the French derivative of judex. With respect to this judex, Gronovius cites several instances in which it is given as a title to military officers among the Romans; and it is to be regretted that king Alfred has neglected the chapter in Orosius, in which mention is made of these warlike judges.* The Teutonic dom, doom, agrees with the Sanskrit root DAM, to tame, subdue, whence damunah, a hero, in the epithet of Sanatakumara, the “tamer of the Solar steeds.”† In Beowulf, dom is commonly glory, power, but king Alfred has it in the sense of slaughter.‡ The affinity of damunah to the Latin dominus, a lord, master; a tamer or subduer (connected with domare to tame, in Gothic tamjan), needs no further observation. Doomer, which is but the same word with another termination, does not appear, in northern productions, to have any relation to war, after the time of Theodoric. It occurs in the sense of the governor of a country,§ as well as in its more recent acceptation; and it is, therefore, an officary designation. If king Alfred had translated the chapter of Orosius, he must have employed the term domeras for judices.

Rectors.

14. There was another term given to a sovereign, which corresponds with the account given of the title of Athanaric, this significant word is rihtar, modern Germ. rihter, the etymology of the Latin rector, from rihten, to judge.|| The

* ‘Africam strenue adversum judices ab eo missus tutatus est.’—Oros. l. VII, c. 42. And the spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he judged Israel rightly, and went out to war.—Judges, III, 10.

† In Amera Costra, p. 9, distich 51.

‡ In Oros. fo. 34, b. “Htessius se geworhte mycelne dom on tham gefcohte.” ‘Ctesius who wrought great slaughter in the battle.’ Nothing of this appears in the Latin, l. II, c. 8, p. 107; and perhaps the MS. should be corrected, dem.

§ ‘Hann var settur domari ifir oll thang lond er hounm lau i nämd: han dæmdi alldrey rangann dom: einginn thordi edur thurfti haus dom ad riufa.’—He was appointed judge over all the lands which lay in his vicinity: he never judged wrong judgments: none dared or needed to break his dooms.—Hervarar Saga, c. 1, fo. 1 b. Add. MS. 11, 109.

|| Wachter compares the Vulgate with Notker’s version in the tenth cen-

alternations repeatedly made by the chiefs of Thervingians, Burgundians, Franks, Visigoths, and other people in the fourth century, between the titles of king and judge, prove that in their estimation the one was equal to the other in dignity.* Gibbon, in noticing the vaccillation of the Thervingian monarchs, attributes to antient times, the modern notions of royalty: "They renounced," he says, "the royal title, and assumed the more humble appellation of judges;"† but from what has been said of the judges, who were the rulers of countries, commanders of armies, and authors of decrees which none dared to disobey, the comparative lowliness of their station is, at least, a questionable proposition. We are not, in judging of former opinions of the royal state and dignity, to think of the difference between a king of England and a justice of the peace or judge of assize. The loftiest titles in Europe have an exceedingly humble origin, if we contrast the circumstances of the first possessors with those of our own times. Among the free nations of the Germans, their rulers in war were merely the leaders of bands of plunderers by sea and land, whose pay consisted in a share of the booty, and in peace, the managers of their households, and rectifiers of differences among their subject neighbours. Their prime ministers, so to call their principal attendants, companions and advisers, carried their wine skins, scoured their armour, and tury, whence it appears that rihter corresponds in import with a landking, or king of the country, with a prince, and with a judge.

Terribili apud reges terræ.

Ps. lxxvi, 12.

Prutelichemo sament dien rihtaren dero erdo.

Vers. Theot.

Reges terræ et omnes populi principes, et omnes iudices terræ.

Die lantchuninga unde alle uerlt linte, und alla rihtara.

Ps. cxlviii. 2.

* In the Litany of Bavo, abbot of Corbey, is a prayer for life and victory to the judges and army of the Franks: "Omnibus iudicibus et cuncto exercitui Francorum vita et victoria." These were unquestionably rihtaren.

† Decline, ch. xxv, s. 5.

CHAP.
VII.

physicked their horses; their lower servants tilled their lands, and their wives and daughters were busied in household occupations.* The queens of king Half contended for superiority in brewing ale,† a princess speaks of washing her own linen,‡ the queen of Ragnar Lodbrog weaves his shirt,§ and that great monarch manufactured with his own hands, the shag breeches which have furnished him with his surname.||

Terms for kingdom denote power or people.

15. These monarchs did not measure their power or rather their magnificence by the extent of their dominions, but by the number of their tents and the multitude of their subjects. Their most ordinary term for a kingdom had no reference to territory, but to wealth and power, and their wealth consisted in horses and oxen; and even the Anglo Saxon kingdom (cynedom) denotes jurisdiction over a tribe, without the slightest regard to the land occupied by the tribe.¶ St. Amand justly observes that all the European

* Tacit. Germ. 15.

† Sogu Thattur af Alfe k. og Reckum hanns, c. 1.

‡ Thus sang Hervor, the daughter of Angantyr, and ancestress of kings of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and England:—

Skal thui skiotlega

skort umm bua

og bleikia lyn

enn burt ek fari

mikid ei thui

at morni arla

skal mier skiera

skirtu og olpu breida.

I therefore will speedily dress my hair,

bleach my linen,

and away I'll go.

Great space there is not between this and early morn, when I shall get ready

a shirt and broad cloak.

Hervarer Saga, c. 6, fo. 6.

§ Queen Aslauga, in presenting a consecrated silken vest to Ragnar, says:

Thier ann eg serk enn sida

og saumdann hvorge|

vid heilan hug ofinn

ur hare smia graum.

To thee I give this serk, wide but seamed in no part,

by a faithful mind woven from the small gray hairs.

Sagann af R. Lodbrok, c. 14.

|| Ibid. c. 2.

¶ The Gothic thiudangardi is an exception, unless it be contended that the kings court, the seat of his jurisdiction, is intended by that term, and so taken for the extent of its jurisdiction itself, which is very probable.

governments consisted originally of few persons, contained in small districts of land, and within the compass of what we now think hardly sufficiently extended to compose one kingdom, we find many princes dignified with the title of king: thus, not to mention others, we read that there were in Italy, kings of Rome, Alba, Hetruria, &c. And though these and the like states were anciently styled kingdoms, yet if we were to speak of them according to the present acceptation of the word and notions of things, we should rather call them clans or septs; for with respect to the extent of ground, the number of subjects, and the power of superiors, they resemble more the Highland lords in the north part of this isle, or the old Tains in Ireland, than the present lustre or power of kings.* As in Liefland or Livonia, before the emancipation of the serfs, the owner of one hundred boors so denominated, was styled a king, so the Greek and Roman historians assign the same appellations to the rulers of cities and a small tract of suburb; and are imitated in the old poem on the siege of Troy:—

In Colkos ile a cite was
That men called hanne Jonitas,
Fair and mekel, large and long,
With walles huge and wondir strong,
Ful of toures and high paleis
Of rich knyghtes and burgeis:
A kyng that tyme hete Eetes
Governed than that land in pes,
With his baronage and his meyné Dwelleden thanne in that cite.†

We still speak of the king of this or that tribe of negroes;‡ and when we would understand the notion attached to a title by an ancient people, we should endeavour to ascertain the primary signification of the word by which they called it, taking their own condition at the same time

* Histor. Essay on the Instit. of Engl. ch. 1. Lond. 1767.

† Colonnas, Trojan History. Wharton, II. p. 98 n.

‡ “Ut nostrates hodie,” says Spelman, “quoslibet apud Virginianos nudæ miseræ plebiculæ ductores, Reges nuncupant.”—Gloss. p. 187.

CHAP.
VII.

into our consideration. In early times we find earls exercising independent sovereignty, and rejecting the title of king; and therefore, when the leaders of the Thervingi and other barbarians, sometimes called themselves kings, sometimes judges, and sometimes dukes, it is very difficult to say which they deemed the most splendid appellation. The Greeks and Romans were pleased with the title chosen by Athanaric, their Gothic conqueror, because it denoted rather wisdom than power; and the Gothic form of the Alamannic and Frankish rihtar, had it descended to us, would have been raihtja, from raihtjan, to make straight. The Anglo Sax. and O. Germ. riht, Germ. richt, Engl. right, Fr. droit (from Lat. di-rect-um), have all the same original import of straight. Rihtar=Rector, Latin, is a judge ruling as a king.

*King.
Sir F.
Palgrave
on the importance of its etymon.*

16. On the title of king, Sir Francis Palgrave, adopting the erroneous principle of Wachter, Ihre, and other philologists, remarks, that "its etymology is important: because the idea which it conveys, viz. a ruler placed at the head of the state, both in peace and in war, the leader, the legislator and the sovereign of the people, does not appear to have been known to the primitive Teutonic tribes. On the whole, I incline to the Celtic derivation, from can or cean (head or chieftain). My Celtic friends are strongly unwilling to accept the honour of furnishing the Teutons with the royal title, and I am asked, how came a Celtic word to spread from the Alps to the North Sea, from the Thames to the Danube? An answer may be easily found to this question. The title was diffused by imitation, and it followed the tribes as they advanced. In the days of Ulphilas, and before the Teutons settled on Celtic ground, the word king was not employed,* and therefore we possess a

* "Thiudans is the term, in the Gothic version, for king: thiudanassus and thiudangardi, kingdom: the root is thiod [thiud-a], but the process by which the derivatives are formed are not obvious." I suppose that I do not chronological proof that the term was not invented until after the age, when the Teutons might have learnt their lesson either in Britain or in Gaul. But can any better solution be offered? Among the numerous derivations from Teutonic roots proposed by various writers, there are many displaying great ingenuity, but not many which possess much plausibility;* and if we compare the laborious efforts made by the learned to establish the Teutonic ancestry of the word with the easy and simple idea suggested by cean, head or chieftain, the Celtic hypothesis will gain more by the parallel, than by any argument which can be adduced in its favour."†

17. The Teutons employed their word head (haufudr, O. N., heofod A.-Sax., haubith Goth., haubid O. G., &c.) with the ordinary termination -ing, or the addition of man, as a termination, for a captain who governed a kingdom. They had therefore, the simple idea suggested by cean, and had no use for a Keltic word which the bulk of the people would not understand. With respect to the chronological proof on which Sir Francis depends that the term king was not invented until the Teutons had been in Britain or Gaul, it fortunately happens that Ammianus Marcellinus, who wrote about 378, and was therefore a contemporary of Ulfilas, has preserved the very title, borne by the kings of the Burgundians: "Among them," he says, understand this remark, for the process is remarkably clear. The termination an-s, in which the s is the formative or grammatical syllable, answers to the termination -ing in Anglo-Saxon, and to -en, -in, and -on in other dialects, and the personal noun is formed from thiud-a, a nation. The termination ass-(us) in which us is grammatical, is equal, etymologically, to the Latin -or in rect-or, &c., (-er Eng. and Germ.); and as to thiudangardi, it is a regular compound of thiudanaus gards, the court or habitation of the thiudans.

* "From konnen, to be able (Wachter, Adelung); or from kennen, to know or to be knowing (Ihre); from hund or chund, a hundred, the ruler of the centena. From kind, child; from cyn, tribe or kindred, and, with the patronymic, (-ing), the child of the nation (Allen)."

† On the Brit. Commonw. vol. II, p. 341.

CHAP.
VII.

Hendinos.

the king is called by the general name of Hendinos, and by ancient custom he may be deprived of his power and removed from his office, if under his administration the fortune of war should be adverse, or the earth refuse its abundance. The Egyptians have likewise this custom of ascribing events of this kind to the account of their kings. The high priest of the Burgundians bears the name of sinistus, and is not exposed like the kings to deposition.* This passage, besides its historical value to such as are interested in the progress of the royal title, is highly important to the question at issue between the Keltic and Teutonic derivations. The last syllable of hendinos and sinistus, is probably the sign of the Latin declension, and to be rejected. If not, -us was a Gothic sign of declension as well as Latin, and -os may stand for -us. In the Gothic Gospel, sinist-ans is rulers of people, from sinista the superlative of sineigs, old; and so siniste or sinistus may very well have signified a high priest among the Germans, although the word has not come down to us from any other source.† How people with a competent knowledge of the Teutonic dialects, ever came to imagine that the untaught warriors who invaded Europe, bringing with them a vocabulary copious to overflowing, and ample means of forming words by easy and most significant composition, should borrow their most or-

* Apud hos generali nomine rex appellatur Hendinos: et ritu veteri potestate deposita removeatur, si sub eo fortuna titubaverit belli, vel segetum copiam negaverit terra, quemadmodum solent Ægyptii ejusmodi adsignare rectoribus. Nam sacerdos apud Burgundios omnium maximus vocatur Sinistus: et est perpetuus, obnoxius nullis discriminibus ut reges.—Hist. l. xxviii, c. 5, p. 417.

† Goth. SIN-EIGS=SENEX Latin. The old Danish de seenste, the slowest, suggested by Sperling as the etymon of sinistus, is in the true fashion of discovering origins in resemblances. The idea of conception in sineigs, senex, &c. is continuity: Goth. sin-th, time, duration. O. N. sinne, time; Mod. Ger. sint, time; A.-S. sin, continual, perpetual:—

“Sin nihte heold mistige moras.”

Beowulf, 321.

In eternal night he held the misty moors.

Kemble.

dinary terms, sometimes from the Romans, sometimes from the Greeks, now the Jews, and then the Kelts, is an unfathomable mystery. All these people had many words in common, though they might never have heard of each other; and it not unfrequently happens that in the process of comparative etymology, the root of one word explanatory of all like or cognate words, is found to be preserved in only one language; whence the inference is, not that all those words are derived from it, but that the other roots have perished by disuse, or that further researches may discover an older root in some oriental form. This term hendinos, preserved by the contemporary of the Gothic translator of the Gospel, and said to be a general name of king, is decisive of the derivation of one title of royalty at least, from hund or chund, a hundred. If those who have before tried to trace the word king to a Teutonic source, have been, as Sir Francis states, obliged to support their opinion by elaborate arguments, it has been precisely because, gentlemen of weight like himself, reproduce the errors which had previously been refuted, but which continually reappearing, compel the advocates of the opposite hypothesis to advance as many arguments as they can assemble, in defence of a derivation that rests on grounds more probable than the Keltic.

18. There is hardly any proposition in etymology better established than the conformity of the Gothic hund with the Latin cent-um, a hund-red. The Gothic H=K Greek and consequently Latin, and D=T. Bopp has observed that the Latin e deviates in the Teutonic into u, as in the case before us, and as ten-uis becomes thun-is, A.-S. thyn, Engl. thin. But we scarcely need to have recourse to a canon, which requires numerous examples to enable it to be immediately adopted. We find hund subsiding into the Belgic hond, and Teut. kön,* whence the transition into the

* On the authority of Wachter. It may be observed that the Greek

CHAP.
VII.

Kindins.

Burgundian hend is not only easy, but what is found to take place in the Icelandic hend, from hond-ir, the hands, and in the Anglo-Sax. hent-an, to catch, Lat. pre-hend-ere, from hand, plu. hond. With respect to the second part of the word, it is either the Indo-European nasal termination -ING or -INC, with a dialectic syllable of formation s, such as appears in the Prussian kynnonss,* a king; and so has been mistaken by the scribe for a Greek -os, hendin-os; or it really is that -os and has consequently no power over the radical meaning. The in, in that case, is equivalent to the Norse inn, in drottinn, a lord, and innumerable other words, the Latin -inus, -enus, -anus, &c. with their descendants in English, French, Italian; and the Burgundian hendin-os in this case, most closely corresponds to the Latin centen-us, a hundred(man), and to the Gothic kind-ins, the governor of a district. And presently it will appear from the history of the word, that hendinos is nothing else than this centenus, and, it may be, kind-ins.

19. The nasal termination of nouns in a possessive form, which, varied by a grammatical suffix of no importance to the radical signification, is common in all the Indo-European tongues, has already been shewn to be Sanskrit in origin.† Through a mistake of its precise meaning by Selden,‡ the A.-Sax. form -ing is mostly considered to be a patronymic at the end of proper names, yet it is no more so than it is in the Sanskrit dhanin, wealthy. In further illustration it may be stated, that as rajni, a queen, in Sanskrit, is formed from raja, a king, with this nasal ter-termination of numerals -konta, answering to our -ty, appears to serve the same purpose as the A.-Sax. hund preceding numerals above seventy; as "hund eahtatig," ogddoekonta, eighty.

* The ancient seat of the Burgundians was the Island of Bornholm, formerly called Burgenda Holm, the Isle of the Burgundi. From their geographical position, it is not improbable that these islanders spoke, like those of Rugen, a dialect blending the Norse with the German. The word hend-inns, if that were the original, would be such.

† See p. 171.

‡ Titles of Honour, p. 600, 601.

mination, so precisely the corresponding Latin regina, is formed from rege;* but to consider cyning, as denoting “the child of the nation,” is to attribute to this grammatical syllable, a signification which it obtains only by convention, when joined to the name of a person. It will not account for the words just mentioned, nor for A.-S. wicing, a pirate, O. Norse bandingi, a captive, drottning, a queen, hofuding, a captain, cum multis aliis; for if it did, we must consider the pirate the child of a bay, the captive the child of a rope, the queen as the child of her husband, and the captain as the son of his head; and yet this etymology appears in a work published under the auspices of the English government.† If Mr. Kemble be right in the root cyn, his derivation of cyning is the most unexceptionable of all, from an Anglo-Saxon source:—

“CYNING, m. (à cyn, generosus, à genere), rex.”‡

20. The king of the Burgundi, it seems beyond all possibility of doubt, bore the same title as the chief of the hundred, whom Tacitus calls centenus; but that hendinos is the etymon of king is not quite so certain. In the following varieties of the latter, it will be seen that the radical t (Sanskrit çat, a hundred) is wanting:—

*Synonymes
of King.*

Lettic	kung	A. Sax.	cyning
Esthon.	kunningas	Courl.	könnix
Fin.	kuningas	U. Sax.	könig
Norse	kunungur	L. Sax.	konnig
O. Germ.	kuning	Belgic	koning
	cuning	Norse	konungur
	chunich		kongur

* The following verses, quoted by Du Cange, notice the Latin termination, where it may be taken for ‘son of’:—

“*Libertate carens colibertus dicitur esse;
De servo factus liber, libertus: at ille Libertinus erit, quem libertus generavit.*”

Gloss. t. II, c. 761.

† Gloss. to Ancient Laws and Instit. of Engl.

‡ Gloss. to Beowulf, v. cyning.

CHAP.
VII.*Etymon
of King.O. U. Sax.* künic
O. Pruss. kynnouss*O. Dan.* konningur
Swed. konung

21. It will be remembered that the aldoras were indifferently styled cyningas, even in the fifth century, and reason would lead us to expect a correspondence, though only of a derivative or figurative nature, in the radical import of the two titles. So completely is this expectation fulfilled that cyning is but the reflex of aldor. The Sanskrit kun'h (where n'h is used for the cerebral n of the original), whence kuni, in an ancient list of allegorical princes,* signifies primarily to nourish or support with gifts ("dhapakarane"), and secondarily to counsel or advise. In Norse, konur is a nobleman. Kun'hing or cyning is the personal attributive of this root, and denotes a munificent cherisher of the people, thus exactly agreeing with the literal sense of aldor, pater, fadhs, and other appellations of ruler already explained. It is not unworthy of notice that the ancient periphrases of a king turn upon the radical import of the word; thus, particularly in Anglo-Saxon poetry, he is the dealer of treasure, the distributor of gold, or the bestower of rings, bracelets, and costly armour, accordingly as the alliteration of the verse may call for the word. So in the ancient gnostic poem, beginning;

"Cyning sceal rice healdan."

The king shall maintain his kingdom, his function is described to be rewarding merit with liberal gifts:—

Cyning sceal on healle beagas dælan.

The king in his palace shall distribute collars:

king Æthelstan, in the poem on his victory over the Danes, is styled,

Eorla drihten
beorna beahgifa

The lord of nobles,
the bracelet-giver of his heroes.

* Vishnu Purana, c. v, p. 390, by H. H. Wilson. Rita and Dhriti are descendants of Kuni.

And in a poem much older than these, when a great king “takes it into his head to build a magnificent palace,” the bard seems so impressed with the signification of his title, which was probably traditional, that he finds no other reason for the undertaking than the monarch’s desire to have a suitable place for the dispensation of his treasures with a paternal regard for the portion belonging to the people.* Kundina, a city, and kunthira, able, powerful, are cognates of cyning.

The ancients, whether hunters, pastors or warriors, paid little regard to territory, but valued themselves on their own numbers. They universally divided their population into hundreds, with a chief over each. The oldest army of which we have any account was so divided. “And he (Pharaoh) took six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and captains over every one of them.”† If for chariots we read tents, or covered waggon, this description, as appears from Ammianus Marcellinus, might serve for one of the Asiatic hordes, who peopled the plains and forests of Europe. The word herr, (A.-S. here, Goth. harjis), an army, denoted equally a multitude and one hundred persons.‡ After the wanderers became stationary, the term hundred was transferred to the district occupied

* Him on mod bearn
thæt heal reced hatan wolde medo ærn micel men gewyrcean thone ylde bearn æfre gefrunnon and thær on innan
eall gedælan
geongum and ealdum
swylce him god sealde
buton folc sceare and feorum gumena.

† Exod. xiv 7.

It came into his mind that he would command
men to build a house,
a great mead hall,
which the sons of men
might celebrate for ever;
and to distribute therein to young and old,
all such wealth
as God had given him, except the peoples’ share and the lives of men.

Beowulf, l. 134, by Kemble.

‡ Herr er hundred.—Snorro’s Edda.

CHAP.
VII.

by the HER; and in Scandinavia, it was called herad. The whole country from the Baltic to the North Sea was divided into herads, which were each the jurisdiction of a heradskongur, or king of the hundred. Of such kings there were consequently great numbers. What of this kind was done in one part of ancient Germany was done in all. Tacitus expressly says of the cavalry, that the number was limited. There are one hundred from each canton; and that (the hundred) is the very name they are called among their own. And what was originally a mere number is now a title and mark of distinction.* Two or three centuries after this observation was made, we are told that the Burgundians called their king by the general name of hendinos, which is the etymological cognate of the “Centen-us” in the old German cavalry, and the Gothic kindins, a governor. In the ninth century the Esthonians named the chief of a burgh or canton, a king:—“Eastland,” says king Alfred, writing from the dictation of a Norwegian traveller, “is very large, and there are many boroughs in it, and in every borough there is a king.† This Eastland included the present Livonia and Courland, where, down to the present time, every possessor of a len or fief containing one hundred serfs, is called a kunningass or könnix, the cyning of Alfred, and our king.‡ In the language of Letten, the province between Liefland and Sanegal, kung is the title of one of these rustic lords. What king Alfred called a borough, his informant must have called in his own language, a herad or hundred.

Hunnonēs

22. Auxiliary or collateral evidence is not wanting.

* Definitur et numerus: Centeni ex singulis pagis sunt; idque ipsum inter suos vocantur: et quod primo numerus fuit jam nomen et honor est.—C. 6.

† Thæt Eastland is swydhe mycel. and thær bith swydhe manig burh. and on ælcere byrig bith cyninge.—Oros. Cott. MS. Tiber. B. I, fo. 12. Burh is here the same as the O. N. byr, pagus, a canton or cantred.

‡ Mart. Zeiller, Regna Sueciæ, Gothiæ, &c. p. 345.

The old Germans long understood the word king as the name of the centenary, or president of the hundred. At the time when our Alfred was recording the existence of kings of boroughs, herads or cantreds, Ottfried was rendering the Gospels into Teutonic metre; and where the Vulgate has centurio, the Gothic version hundafadhs, and the A. Saxon hundredes ealdor, ruler or prince of the hundred, he has employed kuning, a king.* Notker, in the succeeding century, uses hunno, to denote this very centurio and hundafadhs, and Haltaus proves that the judges of hundreds were called hunones and hunnones.† These judges were as much military as civil officers. In each of these German terms the Sanskrit root is perceptible, connecting the signification with that of fadhs and ealdor. With respect to chunna, which appears in the Salic Law for the number one hundred,‡ it must be considered rather as an exception to the Teutonic form of the centenary number, than as the etymon of the kingly title, and it might just as well be taken to be the parent of the old English ching,§ as that of the O. Prussian kunningass or Lettic kung. What seems indisputable is that chief of a hundred was sometimes or by different nations called a and Hundreders.

* The verse of St. Luke, vii, 23: "And a certain centurion who was dear unto him, was sick—and when he heard of Jesus he went unto him," is translated thus, in the German of the ninth century:—

"Ein kuning geiscot iz in war
Joh fuar ingegin imo sar.

Ottfried. l. III, c. 2, v. 5.

A king heard of him for a truth, and went to him immediately.

† Gloss. v. Heune. Eccard explains hunno by centenarius, tribunus, in his notes on the Salic Law.—Tit. xlvi, n. 1.

‡ Tit. 80. "De Chunnas," i. e. de Centenis. In n. 2, "Sexan chunna" is six times 100; n. 3, "Septun chunna" seven times 100; n. 4, "theu walt (walf) chunna," twelve times 100; and n. 7, "tho tocondi wefh chunna," 2500. In Bouquet, Hist. Francor. t. IV.

§ Geoffrey of Monmouth, relating the story of Rowena, says, "Accedens deinde proprius, flexis genibus, dixit 'Louerd ching wosehail.'"—Hearne, Robert of Gloucester, p. 117, n.

CHAP.
VII.Multitude of Kings.

fadhs, and aldor, a hendinos, and a king, of which hendinos alone answers to the Latin centenus.*

If the hundreds were governed by judges, with a centenary title deemed equivalent to king, there were half hundreds which had also kings with a qualifying epithet. Such were the fylkis kongar, or provincial kings, who swarmed in Norway before the conquests of Harold the Fairhaired. It may easily be conceived that a title, admitting of almost universal application, and denoting no more than a bestower of gifts, was widely diffused, was borne by multitudes of petty leaders whose generosity alone kept their bands together; and became in consequence of its universality held in very little estimation. This was the actual fact. Not only were hundreds and half hundreds governed by their own kings, but there was not a wic capable of manning two or three piratical boats, not a ness or promontory, not a neck of land, not a mountain, hill, isle, or islet, which could not produce its own king. Hence we may see the reason that when one of these potentates became of some little consequence in the world by engulfing half a dozen other kings, as the Saxon Egbert did the kings of the Heptarchy, he found it necessary to his dignity to adopt an additional title. In this way arose the titles of thiod kongur, theod cyning, folc cyning, all denoting the king of an entire people or nation, and thus widely distinguishing him from the mob of rulers, who in reality were little more than lords of manors, and captains of roving gangs of marauders by sea and land.

* Of all the derivations of this title, one of Ihre's from the Oriental khān, a lord or chieftain, seems the most probable. In that case the radical idea is dig, delve, (khan, in Sanskrit). In this case, khanin, who digs, is an irregular formation, the word being khanaka, a delver. The termination aka, eka, &c. is the original of the European ich, icus, ig, &c. and khanaka may account for the old Germ. chunich, O. Saxon kunic, Lettic könnix, Low. Sax. konnig, and Germ. könig; while khanin accounts for hendinos and the rest with the nasal termination. The origin of the title is directly to be traced to the pastoral state of society, when water for the use of the cattle was an object of transcendant importance. He that first dug a well acquired a personal property in the circumjacent land, and we find this species of title, as well as frequent contests about wells, in the book of Genesis. The khan or digger, was the proprietor, the maker of khanadik, or dikes, and the owner of the khanatil (Arab. herds of cattle, camels and oxen). He was the prince of the country; thus Abraham claimed land from Abimelech: "Take these seven ewe lambs to be a witness unto me, that I have digged this well."

23. When we find men of erudition like Gibbon and Palgrave, annexing notions derived from the splendour of existing royalty, to the titles of the rude warriors of the Sakasenas, and endeavouring to discover a warranty for the magnificence of these titles in words somewhat analogous in sound, but belonging to languages which those warriors did not speak or understand, it seems necessary to support some of the preceding propositions by historical facts. Of so little significance, then, was the title of king, compared with the ideas which it now suggests, that it graced the names of all kinds of petty chieftains, and conferred the denomination of kingdom upon the people of territories of no greater space than an English parish of average dimensions.* Numerous as were the Swedish herads kongs or kings of hundreds, they were considerably exceeded by fylkiskongs of Norway, where every lord of half a hundred people, called a fylki,† assumed the designation which appears so elevated to some of our historians; and where the lord of several such clans, provided he were an earl and paid no rent, tribute or service to a superior, might style himself king of a nation. All over Scandinavia other varieties and other gradations of kings arose, and from the

Errors respecting their magnificence.

* The Helviconæ for instance, whom Tacitus places between the Oder and the Weissel (c. 43), where there were four if not five other petty nations, are reasonably supposed by Wachter to have received that name from helve, half, and kön, a hundred.

† “Folk eru xl; fylki eru l.”—Snorro's Edda. This fylki is manifestly the Scythian pulk or polk, which is now the name of a regiment of Cossacks. The relation of folk, fylki, folc, volk, polk or pulk, and vulg (us), is striking; but is an exception to law of transition.

CHAP.
VII.

Gramur,
an epithet
of King.

circumstance, that they were theoretically rulers of one hundred people, and from the actual rendering of centurion by kuning, it seems exceedingly probable that it was believed to be a centenary title. Besides the king of the hundred, the king of the half hundred, and the king of the borough, there was the herkong, war king, or army king, the leader of a band of depredators; there was the siokong, sæcyning, or sea king, who peradventure might command a fleet of half a dozen open boats: there was the nessekong or cape king, whose jurisdiction was confined to the huts, which were scattered over one of the narrow tongues of land that serrate the shores of the Baltic and Northern seas. Gramur, the complimentary epithet of a king, which so frequently occurs in Skaldic poetry, has no higher origin than the Sanskrit grama, a village, whence gramati, the barber and head man of the village.* Every petty chieftain, after the first invasion of England by the aldoras, bore the style of king, proving that in his country the Germans did not forget its signification as leader of a band. When the country fell under the dominion of one ruler of the Saxons, he was fully aware that the name did not comport with his accession of power, subjects and magnificence, or his rank above the kings of the continent, and he, therefore, adopted the eastern title of Basileus. There seems to have been an insuperable difficulty in the earlier dialects of the Gothic (supposing it for the moment to have been the parent of the Teutonic languages, of which it was probably only a sister), or in the people themselves, to the admission of foreign titles of authority. The experiment with basileus, several times repeated, was a total failure, and king, resum-

* The verbal root samgrama, fight, in this language, appears to be a compound, SAM, cum, con, col, com, implying conjunction, and grama, and so samgrama, village contending with village. Hence, as the Scandinavian and Germanic nations praised military qualities above all others, the import of gramur, in Norse poetry, may be the Fighter, hero, and still be understood in reference to its connection with grama, a village.

ing its former place, contributed to render the same appellation illustrious on the continent.

If proofs of the diffusion and generalisation of the title of king are deemed insufficient, there is yet to be adduced its employment to designate a chieftain of the Hebrides or laird of a clan, so lately as the tenth century. In the History of Hakon of Norway, it is related of Eric Blodöxe, his brother, and predecessor on the throne, that on sailing to these little islands, he found there numbers of pirates and her-kings.* “It is evident,” says Sir Francis Palgrave, “that the Anglo-Saxon chieftains of minor power, were denominated kings; and hence it may be argued that the title had no particular importance.”† No observation can be truer; the title of a degree loses its dignity in exact proportion as the degree becomes more distributed through the population of a country; on which account a numerous peerage is the reverse of an ornament to a state, for there the sovereign has parted with his chief glory as the fountain of honour; since he can no longer confer suitable appellations of distinction on his most deserving subjects. That of king was so very generally diffused, that the command of a single war-boat was sufficient to authorise its adoption.

* ‘Sidan for han i Sudreyar, oc voro thar margir vikingar oc herkonungar, oc reduz til lids med Eirike kongi.’—Saga Hakonar Goda, c. 4.

† Engl. Commonw. Vol. II, p. 342. The Anglo-Saxons had no scruple in calling the little Danish leaders of clans by this title: thus, in the poem on the battle of Brunanburgh, fought somewhere in England, in 938:—

“ Fife legnn	There lay
on tham camp stede	on the battle field,
cyningas geonge	five young kings,
sweordum aswefede.”	with swords appeased.

In the Sagas, whether purely fabulous or creditable history, a great slaughter of kings is an ordinary result of a battle. Three or four kings with all their people fought in the great action on the ice of Lake Vener, in Sweden (Sagan af Hromunde Greipssyne, c. 6,); and when Eric Blodöxe was slain in Northumbria, five kings shared his fate: “oc V konungar med honom.”—Hakonar Goda hins Saga, c. 4.

CHAP.
VII.

Duke.

Such a monarch was Half, who, in "one ship, new and well furnished," and a crew of twelve men, roved the northern seas with the title of king.*

24. In what manner king became a title of greater dignity has been hinted, and may be explained without difficulty. The German chiefs, from the earliest ages, united in time of war, and chose a leader with absolute power of life and death, with the title of duke, which runs through all the dialects with very little variation. The force brought by each canton into the field was its her or here,† the multitude, and the conductor of the allied forces, now an army, was a togi, toga or tugi, a zoho or zogo, accordingly as the verb to lead, (Lat. duc-ere), was pronounced toga, teogan, or tuga, tinham, teon, (contract. of teohnian,) tiohan, or zeihen, for all of these prevailed among the different nations. On this account the appellation of this army-leader was hertogi and hertugi in the north, heretoga in England, her-

* Pliny describes the vessels of the German pirates to have been single trees, hollowed out, and sometimes large enough to hold thirty men (L. xvi, c. 40). Hence probably these canoes were called ships, scips, skiffs, schiffs, ships, all from one root signifying to scoop, to shape. The Greek skaphe, and the Latin scapha, must be referred to the same origin, as the cognates of the Teutonic terms. The first visit of the Saxons to Britain under Hengist and Horsa was performed in three long ships, holding one hundred men each (Paul Warnefrid, de Gest. Longob. c. 14.), and some centuries afterwards, Ragnar Lodbrog made his last descent on Northumbria, in two ships, called knerir, a word allied to canoe, but denoting galleys.—Sag. af R. Lodhbr. c. 15.

† Fewer than one hundred men would not constitute a Scandinavian her in either of its acceptations, a multitude or army, but a still less number sufficed for an Anglo-Saxon here. "We call men thieves," says king Ine, "up to the number of seven; from seven to thirty-five, we call a lot, or band, and after that number, an army."—Law 12. Among the Bojoarii, or ancient Bavarians, a troop of forty-two shield bearers constituted an army; but the Longobards gave the appellation to a company of four armed men. "Si quis pro injuria sua vindicanda, super quemcumque hominem manu armata, aut cum exercitu ad quatuor homines, in vicum intraverit, &c."—L. Longob. l. I, tit. 17, c. 1. The Irish of the present day call any number of soldiers, however small, the army.

toge in Old Saxony,* herizoho among the Franks, and herizogo among the Alammanni, whence the present German title of Herzog, a duke. The kings of these became the temporary subjects of the army-duke, whose power, unlike their own, knew no restraint. At the termination of the war, the duke surrendering his high office, again became a simple king.† After their admixture with the Italians, the Longobardi, we find, preferring the name of power and pre-eminence, abolished the title of king, and lived under the rule of thirty dukes. These chiefs subsequently assumed a royal title, but it had no affinity to king, for it was that of rex, retained in the present form re. There seems to be a confusion in ancient writers in reference to these titles, which probably arises from repeated alterations between a king in peace and a duke in war. Jornandes styles Berig, the leader of the first Gothic army, a rex.‡ Hermann Contractus says that Tassilo, the first duke of the Bojarii, was created their king, by Childebert, in 594; Paul Warnefrid names him a duke in 596, which is correct.§ The Franks and other people made several changes of this kind in the title of their supreme ruler.

A man raised to arbitrary power, surrenders it with reluctance. Circumstances enabled the Longobardic army leaders to retain much of the influence with the title of duke; but in nations uncorrupted by the example of Italian effeminacy and slavery, the title was laid down with the cessation of the occasion which called it into existence, though it cannot be doubted that after a long war, termin-

* "Do makede he te hertogen Hermanne——"

Chron. Rhythm. c. 13.

† Beda, Suprà, p. 28.

‡ De Reb. Get. l. 1. c. 4.

§ His diebus Tassilo rex Bajoariorum a Hildeberto constituitur.—H. Contr. ad Ann. 594. In the Annales Metenses, 743, Bajoaria is a duchy; and Eginhard, in his Annales, calls Ogdilo "dux Bajoariorum," an. 748, when Charlemagne pardoned his infidelity on condition of his retiring into a monastery.

CHAP.
VII.

ated with success, a portion of power accompanied the leader when he resumed the more humble title of king. He was content with a share of the substance of power, and readily parted with the name. In time, one of our kings, such as Egbert the Saxon, enlarged his dominions by conquest, or by marriage or inheritance, but still bore the kingly style. When such kings united for military purposes, they also chose a leader, but styled him a war king, or a king of nations.* With each success, and each acquisition, the lustre of the title was augmented, and in popular usage, the additional epithet was suppressed, leaving only the principal word king.

*Captain,
Hofding.*

25. The process of improving the centenary title, and investing it with so much splendour as to dazzle the eyes of philologists and historians, may be exemplified by an occurrence in Sweden, which abounded in canton or hundred kings. It is related in the history of the Ynglings, that "the kings of Upsala were the chiefs of the kings when there were numerous kings of hundreds; because when Odin was captain of Sweden, they were sole or absolute captains of Upsala, and sat over all the empire of Sweden until the death of Agn,†" who is said to have been murdered by his queen in 260. This passage is remarkable as showing that the supreme title was at one time captain (Hofding), and that a captain governed in Upsala, ruling over the hundred or heradskings, to whom alone this centenary title was attributed. This was continued until 565, when Braut Omund died, and Ingialld, who was afterwards surnamed the Malicious, ascended the throne. On that occasion he made great preparations to celebrate the arval or feast of inheritance, in honor of his father; and erected a large and magnificent pavilion, subsequently known as the Hall of the seven Kings. When his preparations were completed, he dispatched messengers all over Sweden to invite the kings, jarls, and other men of note, entitled to march under their own banners.* Of royal visitors there were six, who did honor to their entertainer in the new banquetting hall, and when, towards evening, they were quite intoxicated, Ingialld ordered Folkvid and Hylvid, the sons of Svipdag, to arm themselves and followers, and execute the project previously concerted. They accordingly went out and threw fire into the hall, which was soon in flames, and therein were consumed six kings, together with all their attendants. Such of the guests as attempted to escape, were quickly destroyed with the sword. After this act of treachery, Ingialld readily subdued their kingdoms, and rendered them tributary.

* Folc cyning, theod cyning, &c.

† "Vpsale konungar voru æztir konunga i Svidhiod, tha er tha voro mangir heradzkonungar, fra thui at Odhin var hofding i Svidhiod, voro their einvaldz hofdinngiar at Vppsalom sato ofir all Sviavellldi tel thesse Agn do."—Ynglinga Saga, c. 40.

26. In Norway, a similar fate awaited the crowd of petty kings, still more minute than those of Sweden. Harald Harfagre conquered them one by one, and thus became an einvalds konung, a term which implies a king of undivided dominion. Some of them fled at his approach, while others politically submitted. Most of the latter he retained as governors of the districts, formerly their kingdoms, and conferred on them the title of jarl. The circumstances attending the erection of one of these jarls or earls are very curious, and are related with great precision. "In the north, there were two brothers, Herlo and Rollo, who were kings in Naumudal (now Raundalia). For three summers they were occupied in raising a mound, which they constructed of timber, and covered it with stone, lime, and mud. When the mound was finished, they heard that king Harold was coming against them with his army, on which king Herlo, collecting a large quantity of victuals and drink, entered the mound or tomb with twelve of his followers,

*Kings
become Jarls.*

* "Oc baud til sín konungom, oc jörlom, oc ödrom merkis-mönnum."
—Ynglinga Saga, c. 40.

CHAP.
VII.

commanding the mound to be closed after them. King Rollo then ascended the mount, where the kings were wont to sit,* and there causing a royal throne to be prepared, seated himself upon it. After this he ordered cushions to be placed upon the seats that were used by the earls, and descending from his throne, and placing himself on this lower bench, he entitled himself an earl. Having thus renounced the title of king, Rollo went to meet king Harold, and surrendered to him all his kingdom, requesting to become his man, and describing all the particulars of his conduct. Then king Harold took a sword and put it into Rollo's belt. Then he fastened a shield round his neck, made him his earl, and led him to his throne. After that he gave him the province of Naumdal, and appointed him earl there over.†

* All business of importance was deliberated on the haugar, artificial hillocks or mounds, which were of vast dimensions, and hollow, so that they were used as tombs. Some of them were constructed with windows. In these mounds they were accustomed to conceal their treasures, and hence the severe laws which were enacted by the Northern nations, and also by the Anglo-Saxons against walreaf, or plunder of the dead. A lady in Fridthiof's Saga, argues with her lover that it is better that the living should possess wealth than the dead, as an encouragement to him to commence pirate, and ransack tombs. The Salic Law "De Corporibus expoliatis," refers to another enactment still more ancient than itself: "Et antiqua lege si (quis) corpus jam sepultum exfodierit, et expoliaverit, wargus sit, &c." —Tit. 58, n. 1.

† Harallds hinns Harfagra Saga, c. 8. "Northur i Naumudale voru bræthur tveir kongar, Herlaugur oc Hrollaugur: their hofdho veridh at thriu sumur at gera haug eirn. Sa haugur var hlaðhinn með grioti oc limi oc vidhum gorr. Enn er haugurinn var algorr, tha spurdho their bræthur than tidhindi at Haralldur kongur for a hendur theim með her. Tha let Herlaugur kongur aka til vist miela oc drick. Eptir that geek Herlaugur kongur i hauginn með tolf monnom, sidhan, let hann kasta aptur hauginn. Rrollaugur k. for upp haug thann er kongar voro vanir ad sitia a, oc let thar bua kongs hasæti, oc settist thar i, that let hann leggja dynui a forpallin, thar er jarlar voru vanir at sitia. Tha velltiz kongur ur hasætino oc jarls sætidh oc gaf ser sialfur jarls nafn.

"Eptir that for Hrollaugur a moti Haralldi konge, oc gaf honom allt riki sitt oc baudhz at geraz hanns madhur, oc sagdi honom alla sina meðherdh.

27. In Scandinavia, as noticed by Sperling, there was a mey-kongur, a may or maiden king, that is, a queen; and anciently in England the title of king was not exclusively applied to a male sovereign. It is attributed without any qualifying addition, by Robert of Gloucester, to a queen regnant. Speaking of Gondeline, "this sturne wommon," the daughter and successor of Corineus, one of the fabulous kings of Britain, he says,—

CHAP.
VII.

Queen.

"Gondelyn was kyng fiftene ger the
And hire lord was kyng bi fore hire ten ger and mo."*

After the change in the title of the northern princes from drottinn, lord, to king, their wives continued to retain that of drottning, lady, so that a Swedish and Danish queen has a title very distinct from that of other ladies of this elevated station. In the German states governed by kings, their wives bear the same title with a feminine termination; and königin, a queen, might be regularly represented in English by kingess.† The female sovereign of England has a title which was formerly the common appellation of woman, queen, from the A.-Saxon cwen: such also was its signification in old English; in the ballad of Amon and Mardocheus, king Ahasuerus determines to marry, and—

"Of heore kynd the kyng him toke
A qwene to wyve as telleth the boke."‡

Tha tok Haralldur k. sverd oc festi a linda honom. Tha festi hann skiölld a halz honom, oc gerdhi hann jarl sinn oc leiddi hann i hasæti. Tha gaf hann honom Naumdæla fylki, oc setti hann thar jarl yfir."

* Chron. p. 27.

† Apparently, though not really, from chunna, a hundred. Notker has diu chuningin, the queen.—Ps. xliv, v. 10. Tatian drops the aspirate, as "Sundririnu cuningen," queen of the South.—Harmon. Evang. l. lvii, 5.

‡ Wharton, Hist. Engl. Poetry, v. II, p. 178. Quean, a harlot, is the same word, but in Anglo-Saxon it could not have obtained this signification without the addition of hor, as horcwen, in the Laws of Edw. and Guth. II, Ethelbert, VI, 7. Horne Tooke's derivation of this word from hiran, to hire, is eminently absurd. Hors, Gothic, is an adulterer; and horr, O. Norse, a concubine. The conceptive idea is perhaps found in A.-S. hor, horg, horh, spit, dirt, filth, whence horig, squalid: hors, a dirty person, who CAHP.

VII.

Lady.

In the Havamal, Thiodans kona, the prince's wife, is equally the prince's woman, and the Anglo Saxon cwen is no more. The queen, as appears from the Anglo Saxon Chronicle, was sometimes termed seo hlafdig, the lady, and the queen is still styled "our sovereign lady the queen." This is very probably, since it is the feminine of hlaford, a lord, a contraction of hlafording, a word, if it ever existed, analogous in formation to drottning, which the Fins call druting.* However this may be, the old English form was Levedy.

"Blessed be thou, levedy, ful of heovene blisse, Swete flur of paradys, moder of militenesse."†

"Ther was joye and blisse inou tho he thuder com, Mid the levedi of the castel, dam Maud de Mortimer."‡ defiles, and so an adulterer. Hence the English whore, a woman, at first dirty in person, then in morals. Hor-cwen, a filthy woman. In Anglo-Saxon, cwen is also fair, beautiful, and hence some have supposed that the Cwenas or Samoiedes in Alfred's Orosius were so called because they were fair (Barrington's Orosius; Dr. Ingram, Inaugural Lecture). It is mentioned here, because it is the same kind of mistake that is committed in the derivation of cynning, that is, from the dialect in which it appears without reference to its etymology in others to which it equally belongs. King Alfred wrote what Ohther, the Norwegian told him, and consequently adapted kuenar and kuenaland to Anglo-Saxon orthography. Kuenar may be women, but these people were more usually called Hunar, and their country Hunaland or Chunaland. The Gothic qino, Frank. quena, chena, Swedish qwinna, Prussian and Lithuanian ganna, have the ambiguity of the Anglo-Saxon, and are cognates of the Greek gune and the Latin cunnius. Kania and kanya in Sanskrit, is a young girl, and is obviously connected with the root kan, which actively and passively signifies love and be loved; nor is its connection with kam, desire, very remote, since an object to be loved is also desirable.

* Hlafdig, says Horne Tooke, signifies and is merely lofty, that is, raised or elevated; and he conjectures that it was formed thus, "hla, hlafor, hlafd, hlafdig."—Div. of Purley, vol. II, p. 161. He supposes hla, bread, to be both the past tense of hlifian, which however makes hlifade, and the first part of hlaford, a lord. As a proper companion, Mr. Henshall's derivation of hlafdig, lady, from love-dy, a little love, or the beloved, ought always to be quoted with the preceding.

† Prayer to the Virgin, Harl. MS. 2253, fo. 80, b.

‡ Robert of Gloucester, p. 554. So also in Robert of Brunne, p. 128,—

Dam, dame, madame, which last is the proper style of the queen, are supposed to be the Latin domina, a lady, in a french dress. Dama, in Spanish, has the same meaning, but Junius has shown that in the English of Chaucer, dame denoted mother:—

Who shall sheld me from shame?
He that had a maide to dame.

Ploughm. T.

Who that dredeth syre ne dame,
Shall it aby in bodie or name.

R. R. 5588.

Dam or dame in this sense, is obviously referable to the Sanskrit root tam, to grieve, and signify one that has suffered the pains of child-birth; but dame, a lady, is no doubt domina; domna, donna, and dame.

The Danish frue has been employed in the same way as the English lady, which is its common translation, to denote a queen: “Frue Hadenad reigned twenty two years.”* In Icelandic fru, and in Swedish frw, an attempt has been made to derive it from Frija, the Goddess of Love; but this etymology will not suit the old Danish vruuue, i. e. vruvve, the O. Germ. frow, frouu or frovv, and vrouu, or vrovv; or the Belgic Vrouw. In all these words the w is a representative of the Sanskrit bh, sounded like v, and they are all formed from prabhuh, a lord, master, which takes its original from prabhu, i. e. who is rich and exists with eminence.

The derivation of this archaic title from Frija, is as old at least, as Snorro Sturlason, who says that she was the most celebrated of the goddesses, and all women of rank and title (tignar konur) were styled from her name, Fröjor,†

Frau, Fru, Frue, Vrouw.

“Geffrey was ne mo, bot erel of Bretayn,
And dame Helionore scho wes quen of Spayn.
Dam Jon was yongest and lady of Cezile Ther fader was kyng richest lyvand in alle his while.”

* “Vruuue Hadenad regerede xxii jar.”—Everhard. de Eccles. Gandesheim. p. 171.

† Ynglinga Saga, c. 13. Snorro has certainly not copied this observation from any old historical ballad.

CHAP.
VII.

that is frauen (qu. d. fraus), ladies. Ihre observes that in the Rhythmical Chronicle, it was attributed only to one, whose husband was entitled to be styled herr. The Italian bravo, Fr. and Eng. brave (taken substantively), are cognates of these words, and a brave man is a leader who has distinguished himself in any manner.

Hofding,
Captain,
Chieftain,

28. Though the German nations did not call their supreme ruler by any name to denote the head, they still made use of that name to form a title, which in sound and sense is significant of derived power. As the Gothic haubidh or -ith=cap-ut Latin, the head, so the Norse haufudingi=capit-an-eus, Latin, captain, O. Fr. cheventein, Engl. chieftain. This name was given to the ruler of a state or country under a superior, but in many cases it is used synonymously with kongur, a king.* In Anglo Saxon and German, -man takes the place of the termination -ing, in these words answered by the Latin an-; thus heofodman in Ælfric's Glossary, is satrapas, a nobleman; and haubtman in German, a captain.† It is obvious from the formation of the word that it is the original of the feudal title capitan-eus, and the "capitaneus regni" or greater baron of the realm, is no other than the northern hofding. Spelman speaking of noble feods, called imperial or regal, says that they are held under the title of duke, marquess, earl or other illustrious denomination, and are granted by an emperor or king only. And their possessors are called captains of the empire or kingdom, because they hold in capite, or chieftains because they hold in chief, that is from the king,

* 'Eirn hans (Odins) son het Sigurlami. honom fleck Odinn Gardarike, giordest han thar hofdinge yfer.' One of Odin's sons was named Sigurlami: to him Odin gave Moscovy, and he became captain over it.—Hervarar Saga, c. 2. For hofdinge, the MS. in British Museum, has "kr," king.

† "Cameræ Houetmannorum," in Ubbo Emme (Groning. p. 173) denoted the sittings of the headmen of Groningen, who about 1400 collected the revenues of the fields and suburbs, in the same manner as headboroughs, ("consules,") did those of the city.

emperor, or prince.* Like the Norse hofudsmadr and the German haubtman, this hofding and its double, captain, was as much a military as a feudal title—

CHAP.
VII.

Her companye that was so vayr, hü delde vorste atuo
In the one Robert Courtehesse cheventeyn was ydo.†

In French law, capitainerie is the government or command of a royal palace, and its dependent territory. The name is also applied to the office of captains of chaces or woods, such as the capitaineries of Fontainebleau, the wood of Boulogne, and others.

Capitai-nerie.

29. The radical meaning of captain is headman; and a like idea is found in the Norse formadr, Engl. fore-man, German fürst, or first man, and apparently the Latin princeps, which is our prince, and the German prinz. The Romans, during the commonwealth, understood it in the sense of a chief man; thus the principes of the Albans and others, became patres of the senate, and the term princeps senatus denoted but merely the person who had the first rank in the senate, and not its ruler. Under the emperors, even so low as Trajan, and lower we need not enquire, as it is only necessary to ascertain in what sense Tacitus employs the word when speaking of the Germans, we find princeps used by Pliny in his Panegyric, in the same acceptation: “Hic regnum ipsum, quæque alia captivitas gignit, arcet ac submovet, sedemque obtinet principis, ne sit domino locus.” Elsewhere he says: “Scis ut sunt diversa dominatio et principatus, ita non aliis esse principem gratiores, quam qui maxime dominum graventur.” If this word be the compound primum caput, as supposed by Vossius, in his Etymology of Latin, it corresponds partly with fore-man and partly with hofding, for fore-man is forma man, and hofud (ing) is caput; for the Prince.

* Regni vel imperii capitanei, quia in capite tenent, hoc est, a rege vel imperatore, vel principe.—Gloss.

† Robert of Gloucester, p. 396.

CHAP.
VII.Fürst.

Anglo Saxon forma and the Latin primum are equally due to the Sanskrit paranum, first. In Old Norse, formadhr (fore-man), is used where we should say prince.* Fürst, anciently furista, is the adjective signifying the first. Sperling says that it was unknown as a title of command in Spain and the north, but common to the Saxons and the Germans.† It was of high antiquity among the Franks and their imitators.‡ Selden says, “The origin of this title, applied to a territory, and making a rank of dignity above the ordinary counts, does not appear; but some conceive it is to be deduced out of such customs as were antienter in Germany than the Roman government. They observe in Cæsar (lib. VI. c. 23.), of the Germans, that ‘in pace nullus erat communis magistratus; sed principes regionum atque pagorum inter suos jus dicunt, controversiasque minuunt:’ and in Tacitus, ‘elgebantur in iisdem conciliis et principes, qui jura per pagos vicosque reddunt. Centeni singulis ex plebe comites, consilium simul et auctoritas, adsunt.’ They conclude that the name of principes was but translated out of the Dutch, die fürsten, at such time as they had not so many distinctions of honour and power as afterwards they had. And in regard that the hertzen (dukes), were of a greater place in Germany than these paganorum principes or fürsten, and the comites or graves of territories, of a less and subordinate to them, thence it is, they say, that even at this day, the title of prince, with the addition of a territory, is less than that of hertzog (duke), and greater than grave, whereas in other places of Europe it is above that of duke.”* He also observes that fürst and princeps exactly interpret each other. Such being the signification of the word, the title can have denoted no more in its origin than that the person to whom it was attributed, was—1, the first of the council of one hundred assessors, called comites by Tacitus; 2, the first subject of the baga or district which Cæsar and Tacitus call pagus, and in which he was appointed to administer law and justice; and finally, that he was the first of the nobles beneath the herzog, who, as we have seen, was sometimes a sovereign elected by sovereigns to command them and their forces, with absolute power in time of war. In England the title of prince constitutes a dignity in the case of the heir apparent, but is merely a style of address when applied to any other person. As all the members of the royal family, dukes and marquisses are thus complimented, and inasmuch as we use the word in speaking of independent sovereigns, we are very apt to attribute a higher rank to a foreigner with the title of prince, than he obtains in his own country, and consequently higher than he deserves on a just comparison with the nobility of England. Charles V. in an edict respecting composition for crimes, places prince after baron: “Prelate, baron, prince, chevalier.” At an earlier date, it certainly ranked considerably below duke and count, for those were titles of persons exercising regal authority in their duchies or counties. “At St. Petersburg,” says Sir James Lawrence, “where every one is classed according to military rank, every colonel drives four horses to his carriage; but a prince, if he has no office at court, must content himself with a pair.”† Except in the cases already mentioned,

* ‘Thessu samtyda koma austann Asiæ menn ok Tirkjar, og bigdu Norðurland. Odinn formadhr theirra atti marga sonu.’ At the same time the men of Asia and Tyre came from the East, and occupied the Northern lands. Odin, their prince, had many sons.—Hervarar Saga, c. 2. In the Langfedgatal it is said that ‘Odin var Tyrkia kongur. han flydi fyrer Romverjum nordur hingad.’ Odin was king of the Tyrks, and fled from the Romans hither northward.

† De Summo Nomine, konung, s. 59, p. 79.

‡ Wachter, who quotes Gloss. Boxhorn. furistun, proceres.—Ottfried, l. III, c. 20, v. 108. “Ring thero furistono,” circulus procerum, (l. IV, c. 5, v. 78,); “frides furista,” pacis princeps; and Notker “rata dero furston,” consilia principum.—Ps. xxxii, v. 10.

* Titles of Honour, p. 431, 432.

† Nobility of the British Gentry, p. 79.

CHAP.
VII.

and in those of the heir apparent of Spain, who is entitled “el prencepe de las Asturias, d’Espanna or de Navarre,” which like Wales, are considerable dominions; and in that of the members of the royal family of France, the *fürsten and princes of the continent, appear to be on the level of English barons and baronets.

Atheling or Etheling.

30. The title of prince is foreign in England. The Anglo-Saxons called the king’s son ætheling, but they also called the aldermen and earls æthelings. The word means nothing more than a noble family, being radically connected with the Gothic atta, a father; yet in a law of Cnute, an atheling is ranked above an alderman. We shall see the reason of this apparent irregularity on a short consideration of the Anglo-Saxon titles, which will also enable us the better to understand the ancient dignities of duke and count. The etymological import of aldor, a chief, has already placed us in a condition to understand the nature of his office, and the history of the title does not confute the idea which it presents. In the Saxon Chronicle, under the year 446, Hengist and Horsa are styled aldor-men; and under the year 465, a victory of the Saxons is recorded over twelve native kings, who are also called aldor-men. The two first kings of the West Saxons, Cerdic and Cynric, are called aldermen in like manner, under 495. As the successive chiefs settled in the country, they adopted the title of king, which had been rendered illustrious in Scandinavia before the first invasion of Britain. At the same time the title of aldorman thus discarded was given to their nearest relations, who were also called athelings, held territories under them, and commanded their armies. From the latter circumstance heretoga and aldorman became sy-

Aldorman.

* The four select Fürsten of Germany, or Imperial princes, are obvious exceptions, since they are real dignities with sovereign power and jurisdiction. The “gefürstete graven,” or counts with the title of prince, are excepted by the very circumstance that they are counts, and the title itself means that they are the formost of their order.

nonymous; and hence also in the Latin records of the times, as well as in the histories translated from the Saxon Chronicles, the aldormen are called principes, reguli, subreguli and duces.* The name of patricius, which in primary signification is related to aldorman, was sometimes used to denote a person of this rank. Selden mentions a joint grant from king Alfred and Ethelred, aldorman of Merc-land, in which the latter is styled “subregulus et patricius Merciorum.” Ælfhere, aldorman of the same territory, is styled heretoga of the Mercians; so also it may be observed that in one MS. of the Chronicles, year 446, Hengist and Horsa are called heretogan. “And,” says Selden, “this title it seems signified them as they had military power, or as duces in the more proper and antient sense doth. And the title of alderman denoted their civil dignity in such sense as senior or seigneur hath done through ages in most parts of Europe.” Though the latter observation is founded upon a misconception of the original import of the words, there can be no question that the distinction is just.

Where Beda speaks of principes, duces, and subreguli, king Alfred, in his translation uses “ealdormen” as their equivalent,† and he translates by the same word the prætores and præfecti of Orosius.‡ The title of Eorl, as will be shown, was synonymous with atheling, the synonyme of aldorman, and hence aldormen are frequently styled comites, and sometimes consules, by Florence of Worcester, Huntingdon and Hoveden, as well as in the attestations and bodies of charters. Ælfric in the manuscript entitled Liber Festivalis, a translation of Latin Lives of Saints into A.-Saxon, renders “Comes Cappadociæ,” by “ealdormann on thære scyre Cappadocia,”§ alderman of the province of

* Selden, p. 604, p. 605.

† Hist. Eccl. l. iii, c. 3. Selden, p. 608.

‡ Cott. MS. Tiber. B. I, fo. 1 b, 24 b, 25, 36 b, 88 b, 90, 107.

§ Cott. MS. Julius, E. VII. ‘Natal. S. Georgii,’ fo. 70. Alfred renders the comes of Orosius in like manner.—fo. 28, 28 b.

CHAP.
VII.

Cappadocia. Ailwin, the founder of Ramsey Abbey, in 969, and aldorman of all England, is found styled half-konung, or half king, which is clearly Danish, and seems to denote rather a subregulus than one king reigning equally with another.

The possessions of aldormen were sometimes the entire territories from which they received their title. Ethelred, aldorman of Mercia, had all that which had been the kingdom of Mercia, as an aldordom and fief given to him by king Alfred, as a marriage portion with his daughter Ethelfleda. In some places, the dignity and possessions were both feudal and hereditary from the first settlement of the Saxons. Such were the two aldordoms of Northumbria, which began with Otho, brother of Hengist, and Ebusa, his son, which were transmitted by inheritance until 567, when Ide adopted the title of king.* After the Saxons had acquired a familiarity with Danish customs, the titles earl and aldorman were indifferently applied to the same person, similarly to the use of count and duke in that age on the continent. It is in this period that we must look for the signification of alderman as the title of a magistrate of London. The title was not merely officary; it was borne by the noblemen to whom the estates belonged which have since become designated wards of the city. From the earliest times they were by birth and the right of property, the chiefs and rulers of the inhabitants of their respective districts. The court of aldermen is, in fact, the representative of the more ancient mote of the aldoras under a chief elected by themselves to consult for the common welfare of their conjoint estates and subjects. It is for this reason that the customs of London differ from all others in point of trial; for, if the existence of the custom be brought into question, says Blackstone, it shall not be tried by a jury, but by certificate from the lord mayor and aldermen by the mouth of their recorder.* This customary exemption from the operation of the ordinary laws of the land, is owing to no royal favour, but to the quasi royal state and power of the aldormen themselves, in their individual and collective capacity at a very distant period, when each was truly "Ealdorman, Baro Caput Tribuum."† Elsewhere the title of earl predominated, and about 1020 that of aldorman became an appellation of office rather than of personal dignity; yet even in the reign of Henry III. we find some faint notions that the civil aldermen were something more than ordinary justices or guardians of the peace, for records are extant in which they are styled "Barones nostri civitatis Londiniensis," and in which it would be as futile to look for a feudal meaning of baron as it would be in the commissions of the barons of the exchequer. The aldermen of other cities and towns derive their title by direct imitation.

*Aldermen
of London.*

* Selden, p. 608.

31. The fancy for deducing the titles given by warlike nations to their chiefs, from the names of abstract qualities which can be appreciated by none but people in an advanced stage of civilization, attributes the origin of the military title jarl, to ar, honour, and to elle, old age. The latter has pleased some English writers, who think that the title of earl, resulting from jarl, is connected by this means with aldorman, considered to mean an old or older man. A ludicrous derivation of this kind is given in an etymological dictionary of English, in which earl is treated as a diminutive of "A.-S. are, Ger. er, Dut. eer, (in English ere, whence early), which appears to have meant priority, and thence seniority," and the reader is then referred to Aldorman, which the writer derives from æld, the recent Danish corruption of eald, old. Others again declare that the Scandinavians borrowed jarl from the Greek ἄρχων or the Earl.

Jarl.

* Comm. I, 70.

† Craig, de Feudis, 736, uses these words, but mistakes the meaning of the first.

CHAP.
VII.

Latin herus, between which and the German herr, they perceive a close affinity. The editor of Sæmund's Edda suggests an etymon, at once natural and agreeable to the sense in which the word occurs, where it is not employed absolutely as a title of rank.* He conjectures that the old Norse jara, bellum, (Engl. war, jar), has produced "jarl, quasi jaril, bellator," and it may be added, the Anglo-Saxon eorl bears a like relation to eorre, anger. Thus eorl in one passage of Beowulf corresponds with the Eddaic jarl:—

Thær genehost brægd eorl Beowulfes
ealde lafe.

Nearest there brandished Beowulf's warrior, his antient heir-loom (sword)

L. 1582.

In Arabic, jari is bold, brave, leading the van in battle, and jarrar is both an army and a brave soldier. As a title, there is no doubt that earl is the Northern jarl, but as a mere word it was used before the Danes had any influence over the language of the Saxons. The reason is to be found in the common origin of the Eastern and European words, which is the Sanskrit jri, to conquer, overcome, and this is clearly connected with jiri, to injure. As in the Northern languages, an l added to certain Sanskrit roots, is found to form nouns of agency, and appellations of persons; thus kri + l = karl, a workman, gauri + l = girl, a young woman; so the same thing has taken place in earl and jarl. The meaning is obvious, the jarl or earl is the man who jars and overcomes, agreeing in this respect with herr, herro, hearra, a lord, one that takes by force; and

* Thus in the Harbarz Lioth, st. 23:—

"Varek a Vallandi ok vigom fylgdat atta ek jöfrom
enn alldri fættak Odhinn a jarla tha er i val falla
eun Thorr a thrælakynn."

I was in Valland,
and accompanied their wars;
I enraged their kings,
but never appeased them.
Odin has the warriors
who fall in carnage, but Thor has the race of slaves.

since distinction and success in rapine and murder have always been highly esteemed, as if man were naturally a robber and destroyer of his fellows, the name gradually became the sole property of the principal warriors, the natural nobility of all savages, for such unquestionably were the ferocious pirates who introduced it into England. Jarl, by all northern antiquaries, is considered a modern title of honour.*

In a later age than the composition of the Eddaic poems, jarl became a most illustrious title, and superseded that of kongsson, king's son, as the style of a prince in the lifetime of his father. This was the use of etheling or atheling as a title among the Saxons. With atheling, eorl was synonymous in the earlier times, and in the Laws of Ethelbert, in 597, the latter was applied to a prince of the blood. It was about the reign of Cnute that earl ceased to be used in this sense, and began more generally to supersede the title of alderman. "The authority of Ethelweard," says Sir F. Palgrave, "seems to be conclusive, that in his time the title of earl, if considered as denoting a specific dignity, was not employed by the Anglo Saxons.† But it certainly designated a person of a noble race. This is the form in which it is employed in the laws of Ethelbert, The earl and the churl are put in opposition to each other as the two

* Perman notices that it was a proper name, extant upon Runic monuments :—

1. "Hulmfrida lit gera badi bro, oc rita stain istir bonda sin JARL, oc suni sina."

2. "Gridur ock Ulfr their litu hackva stain at JARL fadur sin."

1. Humphrey caused the two brows to be made, and the stones to be inscribed to his bond Jarl, and his son.

2. Grid and Wolf caused the stone to be sculptured to their father Jarl. —Perm. de Tit. Graff, p. 86. Ol. Verel in Ind. in Herauds Saga, v. Jarl, p. 87, 8.

† "Undecim consules," says he, speaking of the defeats sustained by the Danes, "quos illi Eorlas solent nominare, et rex eorum unus. IV. 3. The root of earl or iarl may also be discerned in ερως, herra, herus. [The root of herra, &c. is hri, to sieze by force, hara, war, or what siezes upon.]

CHAP.
VII.

extremes of society. The laws of the Kentish kings and the traditional custom of the age of Athelstan describe the earl-kind race as the highest order of subjects: they are placed above the ealdormen, and if that last mentioned term be taken in its more usual technical sense, as denoting the hereditary rulers of the smaller tribes, there may be some reason for the supposition that in this particular instance the title of earl denotes the athelings, the immediate descendants of the sovereigns; and the traditionary opinion that the sons of the kings of England were earls by birth, seems like a reminiscence of the Anglo Saxon policy. In the more general sense, however, earlship or earldom was only high nobility; and very long after the title was appropriated by law to a peer of parliament, the yeomen of the north continued to bestow this title upon gentlemen of ancient descent and honoured family. When Johnny Faw,* the Gipsy, is described as earl of Lower Egypt, it is only the same application of the idiom of the olden time.

With respect to the traditionary belief that the sons of our kings are earls by birth, Sir Francis says: "The second sort of earls are earls by birth, and so are all sons of kings of England, if they have no other dignity bestowed upon them. So asserted by Doddington, in his argument on the Bergavenny case, (Collins, p. 102). I cannot trace the doctrine higher, but it has every colour of antiquity. Whatever are the rights of the younger sons of the king of England, supposing they are not advanced to the peerage by the usual mode, they are now mere commoners; and if arraigned for felony would be treated by a common jury. But it is difficult to believe that in the old time they were destitute of every dignity and nobility. The great earl of Whitfield, the enemy of Hobby Noble, (Border Minstrelsy, I. 245,) was only an individual of a good old family. The earls of Socburn were gentlemen of the same class, (Surtees, Durham, II. 209.)”*

* See p. 42.

These illustrations are valuable in showing the purport of this particular title, and the origin of titles in general. Johnny Faw, in Gipseý language is a chief, a leader,† but in English an earl; and men above the common rank are esteemed earls by the common people, who give them this style. In the idiom of the old time to which Sir Francis refers, it was common to employ such phrases as “jarlar ok karlar,” among the Norsemen, and “eorlas and ceorlas,” earls and churls, among the Saxons, where we should say princes and peasants. The phrases are manifestly of very high antiquity, and transport us into those remote ages, when it was essential to the existence of a community, that one class should be employed in protecting another, which engaged in those agricultural labours that were indispensable to both fighters and workers, for such is the etymological signification of this periphrasis of society.

Earls and Churls.

The quasi regal establishment of an earl continued to a late period. It is graphically described by Froissart, in his account of a dinner on Christmas-day, at which he was present, in the hall of the castle of the celebrated Gaston, count of Foiz, at Ortez, in Bevern, in 1388:—

“At the upper or first table sat four bishops, then the earl, three viscountes, and an English knight belonging to the duke of Lancaster. At another table five abbots and twelve knights of Arragon. At another, many barons and knights of Gascony and Bigorre. Four knights were the chief stewarts of the hall; the two bastard brothers of the earl served at the high table. The erles two sonnes, Sir Ivan of Leschelle was sewer, and Sir Gracyen bare his cuppe. And there were many minstrelles as well of his owne as of straungers, and eche of them dyde their devoyre

* Palgrave, Rise of Engl. Commonw. II, Append. Earls.

† It is = fad in thiufad. See p. 41, n.

CHAP.
VII.

in their faculties. The same day the erle of Foiz gave the haraudes and mynstrelles the summe of 500 frankes: and gave to the duke of Towraynes many gownes of clothe of gold furred with ermynes, valued at 200 frankes. This dinner endured four houres." The earl's ordinary mode of supping is then described. "In this estate the erle of Foiz lived. And at mydnyght when he came out of his chambre into the halle to supper, he had before him 12 torches borne by 12 varlettes standyng before hys table all supper: they gave a grete light, and the hall ever full of knyghtes and squyres; and many other tables dressed to suppe who wolde. Ther was none shulde speke to him at his table, but if he wer called. His meate was lyghtlie wylde foule. He had grete plesure in armony of instruments, he could do it right well hymself: he wolde have songes sung before hym. He wolde gladly se conseytes and fantasies at his table. And whan he had sene it, than wolde he send it to the other tables. There was sene in his hall, chambre and court, knyghtes and squyers of honor goyng up and downe, and talking of armes and of amours, &c." After supper, Froissart was admitted to an audience with this magnificent earl, and used to read to him a book of sonnets, rondeaus and vireloys, written by a gentle duke of Luxembourg. The custom of bearing torches or candles, whence the servants were called valets de chandelle, gave occasion to a savage trick played by a feudal lord mentioned by Gregory of Tours. Shakspeare's candle-holder is the same servant.*

Northern Earls and Dukes.

Among the ancient Norwegians the jarl stood next in rank and power to the king, but towards the end of the monarchy, the title of heretog or duke was employed to denote the same kind of person who had previously enjoyed the rank and exercised the power of an earl.† The station

* See Warton, v. III, p. 76.

* In the Sagas, Jarls, exercising independent sovereignty, are often mentioned. "Jarl nefndur Biartmar, han reidhi fyrer Aldeiuborg, ok tho hon bæri ey hærra tignar nafn, tha var ey oryka enn marger kongar." There and dignity were unaltered ; the name only was changed. The earl was second to the king in the provinces which he governed, and which was held to be a king in the king's place. Before the use of hertog as a dignity, some of the earls had subordinate earls. Earl Hako had sixteen of these inferior nobles, and he himself must therefore have been a pro-rex. This powerful chieftain gave the whole of the Feroe Islands to Sigmund, to be held of him as a fief by the payment of an annual rent, which from the expression in the history of those islands, appears to be the third of the revenues, like the third penny of the English earls.* On the appointment of earl Gutturm, uncle of Harald Harfagri, to the command of the army, he was called hertoge,† and this, Resenius thinks, was the occasion of the latter title superseding that of earl. There can be no doubt, however, that earl continued to designate a very high dignity, since it was given to the deposed kings of provinces and to such nobles as were appointed their successors. This use of earl among the Northmen is parallel to its

was a Jarl named Biartmar, who reigned over Ladoga, and though he bore no higher a title, he was not less powerful than many kings.—Hervarar Saga, c. 5, fo. 4. Fridthiof, in the Saga which bears his name, rejects the offered title of king in his preference to that of an earl. Perhaps when this Saga was written the latter was less common than king, which was borne by an immense number of petty chieftains of no more account than so many lords of manors.

* ‘Eyar alla skaltu hafa i lèn af mer, segir jarl, ok gjalda mer skatta af minum hlutum.’ All the islands thou shalt have in fee of me, says the earl, and pay me scot from my portions.—Færeyinga Saga, c. 25, p. 118. By one of Harfagre's provincial laws the Jarl is to have the third of the rents and taxes for his table and expenses: “Oc skylldi jarl hafa thridhiung scatta oc scyllda til bords oc kostnadhar.”—Haralds H. Saga, c. 6, p. 78.

† ‘Gotormur modher brodher hanns giordhiz forstiofe fyrir hyrdinni oc fyrir öllum landradhom: hann var hertoge fyrer hyrdhlidhino.’ His uncle Gotorm was made president of the court and all the counsellors of the land: he was general of the court (royal) troops.—(Heims Kringla, t. I, p. 76.) In the following, hertugi is used as the title of Guttorm. “Haralldur kongur oc Guttormur hertugi.”—p. 77.

CHAP.
VII.Vice-
counts.

Anglo-Saxon application, in the first instance to princes of the blood, and then as a substitute for the very high title of aldorman.

32. In the reign of Henry I. the Anglo-Saxon heretoga had descended to a grade below that of the vice-comites, or sheriffs of shires which were not governed by earls,* but the Germans have not only retained but have formed from it the title of Erzherzog, a chief or archduke.† The Goths and Vandals, on overrunning the provinces of the western empire, abolished the Roman dignities wherever they settled; but the Franks and others are said to have retained them, and divided France into provinces, giving sometimes the name of duke, sometimes that of count, to the governors. Camden observes that in England during the Saxon times, the commanders of armies were called duces after the ancient Roman manner, without any addition; but this ancient Roman manner was also the manner of the Saxons, Norwegians, and other people of Gothic race.

England.

William the Conqueror styled himself, in Saxon, not duke but earl of Normandy; and the title of duke lay dormant in England until the reign of Edward III., who erected the duchy of Cornwall for his son the Black Prince. “As the Lombards in Italy,” says Selden, “chose dux rather than comes for their highest title under the king, so in some parts of France, Germany, and other countries (where those Northern nations planting themselves had found the provincial names of dux and comes, as they denoted governors of provinces), comes being apprehended to be every-way, at least as honorable a title as dux (it was indeed greater in the old empire), was retained also among such France.

Germany.

* Intersunt episcopi, comites, vice-comites, heretochii, trithingrevi, led-grevi, &c.—Leges Hen. I.

† Wachter derives erz from apχt, which gives the English arch. The Sanskrit root ARCH, signifies to honor; archita, honored; hence erzherzog is the honored or honorable leader; if not, erz is a corruption of aryya, a governor, from ri, to go.

as were subordinate, as a title of highest dignity, as dux in Italy. And oft times both that and dux were taken for so much the same, that there was no difference of dignities designed by them.”* Though the French retained the names and forms of the ducal government, yet under their second race of kings, there were scarcely any dukes; for all the great lords called themselves counts, peers, or barons, except the dukes of Burgundy, Aquitaine, and France. The last, however, held by Hugh Capet himself, corresponded to the modern maire de palais, or king’s lieutenant. The governors of provinces, whether calling themselves dukes or counts, seized upon the sovereignty of their charge, and it was with much difficulty that they could be induced to acknowledge the feudal superiority of the king. Gradually the provinces thus violently separated, were united to the crown; but the title was no longer given to governors of provinces, and at length duke became a mere title of dignity, annexed to a person and his male heirs without any domain or jurisdiction over the place of which he is duke. The coronet placed over the escutcheon of a duke, is the only vestige of his ancient dignity and splendour.†

* Titles of Honour, p. 334.

† VISCOUNT. This modern title does not properly enter into a disquisition on the primitive titles of European tribes; vicedominus, vidame, and some others have a better claim in respect of antiquity, but they are all fully treated by Selden. Of the first, however, Sir Harris Nicolas, the best modern authority on such subjects, says: “the word had long been used to denote the sheriff of a county, and though the dignity was known in France at a much earlier period, when, like all other titles in that kingdom, it was of feudal nature and attached to lands, it was not introduced into England until the reign of king Henry the Sixth, which monarch, on the 10th of February, in the 18th year of his reign, anno 1440, created John Lord Beaumont, Viscount Beaumont, by letters patent. The words of the creation are “Nomen Vicecomitis de Beaumont imponimus, ac ipsum insigniis Vicecomitis de Beaumont realiter investimus, locumque in Parliamentis consiliis et aliis congregationibus nostris, super omnes Barones regni nostri assignavimus eidem.” This dignity was limited to the heirs male of his body, and it is observable that king Henry at the same time granted him the Viscounty of Beaumont in France, which had been forfeited to

Vice-
dominus, Vidame.

CHAP.
VII.

the crown by the rebellion of the duke of Alençon, and granted by Henry the Fifth to his brother the Duke of Bedford, but by his death had reverted to the crown. The second instance occurred a few years afterwards, for it appears that Henry Lord Bouchier was, on the 14th December, 25th Hen. VI. 1446, summoned to Parliament as Viscount Bouchier, and it is presumed that the patent of creation to that dignity was dated shortly before that writ was issued, but neither Dugdale nor any other writer cite any such patent, but merely refer to the writ as proof that he was so created."—Synopsis of the Peerage, vol. I, p. lxxi. See also p. 77.

Judge Barrington, on 20 Henry VI. c. 9, the order of trial of countesses, &c. for high treason, observes, "By the enumeration of the ranks of peerage in this statute, duchesses, countesses ou baronesses, we may correct a mistake of the heralds, who inform us that John Lord Beaumont was created the first English Viscount in the 18th of this king; but it is impossible that the legislature, two years after the introduction of a new order of nobility, should have omitted to enumerate it in the present statute, between the ranks of counts and barons. This new rank was, however, instituted before the 30th year of this king, as the 31 Henry VI. c. 2, mentions it among other degrees of nobility. In Madox's Baronage, the word vice-comitissa is used in a record so early as the time of Henry II.* This Viscountess is styled de Bello Monte, and she was probably a foreigner, who had obtained this rank in France."†

An earlier statute than this 31 Henry VI. mentions the male title: the act of resumption, passed in the 29 Henry VI. 1451, excepts John Viscount de Beaumont and Henry Viscount Bouchier, and their heirs, and 20 marks granted to them in their patents of creation, notwithstanding that no viscounts were created in the reign of Henry V.—Rot. Parl. t. V, p. 221. We see by Sir H. Nicolas, that it is no mistake of the heralds to adopt the authority of the writ of summons, although it may not be easy to explain the omission. In the eyes of a judge, parliament naturally appears to be infallible; but greater blunders than this are said to have been perpetrated by the concentrated wisdom of the country.

* "(p. 144.) Marchionesses, indeed, are also omitted in this statute, and there was a Marquess of Suffolk in the 23rd Henry VI. See Rot. Parl. v. V. p. 73." † Observations on Anc. Statutes.

CHAPTER VIII.

Titles of Associates or Companions.

- 1.—GRAFF, reve, sheriff; headborough; borsholder. 2.—Gesidh, gesindo, titles of nobility equal to count. 3.—Leod, a chief; court of the leodes, court leet; court baron; socage tenure; soc, sac; frank firm; sithessoen. 4.—Sidesman; bye laws, burlaw-men; sithesmen, gesidhesmen, sidesmen. 5.—Gisindo, grafio, gravio. 6.—Tungreve, mayor. 7.—Bailiff.

1. From the choice of the title of count, by nobles who had rendered themselves independent of their monarch, and had assumed sovereign power in their own lordships, and from the neglect, or rather indifference, with which they treated that of duke, there can be no difficulty in believing that the superiority of the former was a continuance of its ancient pre-eminence. The word denoted the personal friend or companion of the ruler, while the title of duke was only officary and temporary until it acquired a permanence among the Longobards in Italy.* A question arises which is not easily solved, and that is, by what name did the Germans in the time of Tacitus, call those counts or companions of the chieftain, who were the occasion of instituting comites in the empire? In the age of Tacitus, the word comites had not acquired the peculiar sense in which it is employed in speaking of the German nobles, and it is fair to conclude that it was the word which most nearly conveyed the import of the German appellation. If this be not granted, it will not be denied that the Roman endeavoured by the word comites to convey a notion of the office, duties, or occupations of the German companions.

CHAP.
VIII.

Graff.

* Suprà p. 224.

CHAP.
VIII.

In either case the enquiry becomes limited to those words which answer in some respect to comites, or are descriptive of the kind of attendance on the king, which Tacitus attributes to the comites.

Graff, in German, is the present name of a count, in Swed. and Danish greffwe, O. Sax. greyfe. Schilter produces the following varieties in old German, grave, grefe, and gerafe, reve, which appear to be English and A.-Saxon. In the barbaric codes the word frequently occurs as graphio, grafio, gravio, and is explained in them to mean both a count and a fiscal judge. Graffio is the same title in a charter of Kenulf, king of Mercia, in 796.* Lye and Wachter, resorting to the violence common to the older etymologists, transpose gefera, a companion,† in order to make gerefa, the A.-Sax. equivalent of the words. Even if this unnatural process had taken place in Saxon, it is little likely that it would also take place in the other Teu-

* Nec principes nec graffio hanc lenitatem præfatam mutare audeat.—Mon. Angl. I, 100.

† There is remarkable testimony that gefera, which seems etymologically = PAR Latin, an equal, was applied in the same manner as fellow, and that it was not among the Saxons an appellation of dignity, or of office like gerefa. After the martyrdom of king Edmund, according to Ælfric's homily on his passion, the heathen fleet-men or pirates, cut off his head and concealed it in the woods, where it was protected from injury by a ravenous wolf. The country people, on finding the trunk, went in search of the head, "crying everywhere, as is the common custom, when they go into the woods, 'Where art thou now, gefera?' And the head answered them, Here, here, here."—Cott. MS. Jul. E. VII, fo. 203. Gefera is, therefore, a peer, and after having been lost to the English, has returned through the medium of the French pair, from par, Latin, but very early with a restricted application, notwithstanding that in Law all men of one grade are said to be peers:—

And if thou were of such lignage,
That thou to me were of parage,
And that thy father were a pere,
As he is now a bachilere;
So siker as I have a lif,
Thou shouldest than be my wif.

Gower, Cons. Amoris, b. 1.

tonic dialects. And if it did, it would not account for the fiscal appellation of graffio, or gravio, or the present signification of reve, which in the west of England denotes the bailiff of a monor. Gerefa is graffio, and the direct producer of reve, answering in etymology to the Sanskrit graha, Reve. a receiver, a taker, and, in application to its derivative grahaka, a police officer, a constable, a bailiff. Of all these words, the low English grabber is the undoubted cognate.* Such being the original import of the word, we see the propriety of its application to the sheriff, the scyre gerefa, Sheriff. reve or bailiff of the shire, who is “a judge as the keeper of the king’s peace, and a ministerial officer of the superior courts of justice, or the king’s bailiff.”†

What the sheriff is in the county, the headborough may have been within the town, but though borsholder in later times was equivalent to this officer, originally, by the signification of his name, burh, a castle, and ealdor, a chieftain, he must have been a castellan. Head-borough.
Bors’-holder.

From this deduction of greff, it is evident that none of its cognates correspond to the comites or companions of the German princes.

2. The Anglo-Saxon gesidh has been mentioned,‡ as corresponding to the comes of the Latin writers on the ancient Germans, and it was a title of nobility. A gesidh was the companion of his king, he that went with the king on a sidh or journey, military or otherwise.§ Sometimes the rank is denoted with the same addition of man, that was made to the aldor. Selden says, “Among the miracles of John, bishop of Hexham, about 700, Bede has this title, ‘Ut conjugem comitis infirmam aqua benedicta curaverit,’ (Eccl. Hist. l. v, c. 4, 5,), and king Alfred, translating it, Gesidh, Gesindo.

* Engl. grabble, Germ. greifen in angreifen, Engl. gripe, A.-S. gripan, Norse gripa, prehendere.

† Blackstone, Comm. I, 343.

‡ In a note on a passage from Dr. Brady’s History, IV, 2, and III, 9.

§ The Sanskrit shidh, in one class of verbs, denotes to promote welfare, to govern or direct, and in another, to go, to move. Ancient kings and governors held ambulatory courts and councils.

CHAP.
VIII.

hath gesidhmonnes wif (the wife of the gesidhman or count); and in the body of his story, ‘villa erat comitis cujusdam qui vocabatur Puch’; the Saxon is, wæs sumes gesidhes tun se wæs Puh hæten (there was a gesidh’s town, which was called Puch). And in the title of the next chapter, ‘Puer Comitis,’ is Gesidhmonnes cniht; and divers other places there are; but the word comes is never translated ealdorman.”* The following observations on this title are transcribed from the Glossary to the Anglo-Saxon Laws, published by the Record Commission: “Some of these gesithas had land, others had not (Ine’s Laws, 45, 51). The lands they held were, in some cases at least, not their own (Ine, 63, 68). When companions of the king, i. e. servants of the state, the lands they held were probably folk-lands. In the latter periods of the Saxon history the appellation of gesith fell into disuse, and appears to have been superseded by that of thegn. The gesithas were the same with the leudes or noble vassals among the Franks and Visigoths, and both were derived from the comites of the ancient Germans. It would seem that the comites of the king had the designation of thegn before it was given to the comites of the inferior chiefs (Ine, 45). Gesithas might receive grants of bocland.”

Leod, a chief.

3. The leudes were vassals, and primarily men, like the Anglo-Saxon leode, which in the singular, leod, is a chief-

* Titles of Honour, p. 608. Other examples in Beda’s History and Alfred’s translation of it are in l. III, c. 14, 22; l. IV, c. 4, 10, 22. In Beowulf, while, as before noticed, aldor is synonymous with king, and earl is a fighting man, gesidh is constantly a noble companion, and ætheling :—

Hradhe heo æthelinga anne hæfde fæste befangen tha heo to fenne gang
se wæs Hrodhgare
hæletha leofost on gesidhes had.

Soon she had fast clutched
one of the ethelings
when she went to the fen;
he was to Roger,
the dearest of his heroes,
in the quality of a gesidh.

L. 2588.

tain. This first sense of leode is derived from the Gothic lauts, homo.* Leod is found in the compound leod-cyning, and it often occurs in its simple form:—

Him tha ellen rof andswarode wlane Wedera leod word æfter spræc.†

Him the famed for valour, answered,—
the proud prince of the Westerns, words afterwards spoke.

One does not exactly see how the change of number should reverse the signification of this word. Respecting sidhesocna, the socn or manor, with its jurisdiction held by a gesidh, the writer of the Glossary just quoted, says, “As the kings and great men rose in rank and importance, their retainers gradually exchanged the title of gesith for that of thegn. Some districts, it is probable, were withdrawn from the hundreds before this change of appellation became universal, and remaining still privileged jurisdictions, retained the name of sithesocna after the gesith or sith had lost the name. It appears from Dugdale’s Warwickshire, that so late as the time of Henry II. there were three of the present hundreds still called sithesocn.—Allen’s Inquiry, p. 149.” The tenants of the sidhesocn, were the leode, and the court of the manor was thence denominated in after times the Court Leet; but the same tenants were also vassals of the gesidh, and denominated socmen and sidhesmen, according as reference was intended to the chief or his jurisdiction. The gesidhas became thegns, and the thegns under the Norman received the name of barons, whence the court of the original gesidh was then called a court baron. Mr. Whitaker, illustrating his observation that “in the feudal polity of England, the whole kingdom and a single barony were exactly the mirrors of each

* Mr. Wining gives the following line of cognates; Sclav. liudi; Lithuan. liaudis; Lett. and O. Pruss. liaudis; Goth. laudeis; O. H. Germ. liuti. The conceptive idea seems to be that of union, society, close affinity. Sanskrit li, in infin. latum s. letum, to embrace.

† Beowulf, l. 679.

CHAP.
VIII.Court Baron.

other," finds the court baron to resemble the feudal parliament in its constitution. "The baron," he says, "held a court, at which all the vassals were obliged to attend, and he presided as the judge, and they assisted as the jury. But the vassals who attended were only the feudatories of the chief, the mesne lords, or the frank tenants who held under him. They and they only were the members of the court; in their presence were the acts of it executed, and by their assent were they ratified. And in this judicature and with the concurrence of these members was that legislation executed by the baron, which was the incident equally of the baronial and parliamentary court, and those laws were enacted which exist to this day in the variegated customs of the different manors. Such also in every part would be the parliament of the king. The vavasors were obliged by their tenures to attend the little court of the barony. And the barons would be equally obliged by theirs to attend the court baron of royalty. The former were bound to act as assessors with their lord on causes that arose among the tenants of the manor. And the latter would equally be bound to be assessors to the king on all that emerged among the tenants of the crown. The former were empowered under the direction of their lord to make laws for the regulation of the barony, and the latter must have been privileged under the control of the monarch to make rules for the government of the kingdom. The one judicature was called the court of the baron; the other was denominated the court of the king (Ingulf, f. 501, 502)."*

Socage Tenure.

As socage tenure, since the abolition of the feudal system, has absorbed almost every other description of holding, it may not be useless to examine a term, which the great writers on English law have been obliged to receive with erroneous interpretations. "I cannot," says Blackstone,

* Hist. Manch. v. II, p. 170, 1.

who is thoroughly persuaded that the tenure "is a relic of Saxon liberty," and is not debased by a connexion with plough service, "I cannot but assent to Mr. Somner's etymology of the word, who derives it from the Saxon appellation, soc, which signifies liberty or privilege; and being joined to a usual termination, is called socage, signifying thereby a free or privileged tenure. This etymology seems to be much more just than that of the common lawyers in general, who derive it from soca, an old Latin word denoting (as they tell us), a plough; for that in ancient time this socage tenure consisted in nothing else but services of husbandry, which the tenant was bound to do to his lord, as to plough, to sow, or reap for him."* The learned judge argues that this description does not agree with the nature of socage tenure, which in the older law books was termed fraunke ferme, and which was a tenure by fealty without any base service. This word frank, which occurs in German and French, is understood to mean free. Franca, the only word resembling it in Anglo-Saxon, is a kind of spear or lance, and so far seems to be independent of the other. Properly libre in French, and frei in German, answer to the A.-Sax. frig, and English, and franc, in this sense, is foreign, or rather this sense of it is secondary and derivative. It is manifestly the Gentile appellation of Frank, which has before been mentioned as probably the Sanskrit prangch, eastern. Its earliest appearance is in an antient itinerary, quoted by Schildius, where it was given as the second or alternating designation of the Chamavi, a people who dwelt south of tribes between the Elbe and Ems.† Afterwards Francus is mentioned by Ammianus, Eutropius, and some other writers about the decline of the Roman empire; and it is not improbable that the Anglo-Saxon

*Frank
Ferme.*

* Comm. II, 80, 81, &c.

† "Chauci, Ampsivarii, Cherusci, Chamavi, qui et Franci."—De Cæcis, l. II, p. 48.

CHAP.
VIII.

franca was so called because it was the same kind of weapon as that used by the Franks.

The Franks, "thi Francken," which Schildius tells us was the same as if they had been called liberti, were not more free than any other German tribe, and for that very reason, it is unlikely that the Chamavi would be designated by a term, which must necessarily be ambiguous and obscure. It had not acquired the sense of the vernacular frei in this age, and we shall look in vain for franc, or franck in the sense of free, before the gentile appellation became contrasted with that of the provincial Romans of Gaul, when Romanus denoted one that was not admitted to render free services to the state as the condition of his tenure of land. To possess Salic Land was itself a title to nobility, and they who lived under Salic law were Franks, the only freemen in the country; Salic land and frankland were convertible terms; and when the Normans came into England, they found that their "franc fief" answered to the Anglo-Saxon tenement of a socman. Hence frank in the different languages acquired the signification of free, and socage tenure came to be denominated fraunke ferme.

It has been seen that sucken is the jurisdiction of a Fawd or Fowd,* and it is unnecessary to add that it is the same as socn, more recently soken and soke, the jurisdiction of a gesidh, technically sidhesocn. Mr. Kemble, with all deference to him, seems to err in considering it a derivative of the Anglo-Saxon. Under the word "Socn, visitatio," he says, "Probably this word and secean (to seek), should be placed under sacan (arguere, increpare), from whose preterite, soc, they are derived." Socn is social intercourse; Sanskrit sakna and saknu, a speaking civilly or kindly; so sakhi, a friend, sakheya, friendly, social; sakhya, friendship, are words to which the Latin soci-us, a companion, and societas, may be referred. The root of these words is sak, be able. There is another class of words formed from the root śah, to be able; as sahaya, a friend, companion, one able to assist; sahayata, and sahayatwa, society. Socn or soken is, therefore, not only friendly communication, but mutual assistance, and as a technical term for jurisdiction, strongly significant of the fatherly care of a German or Saxon chief, and the free intercourse which existed between him and the people.

* Suprà, p, 137, n.

With respect to the word sac, which old lawyers say, signifies as much as causa in Latin, and which indeed may denote a cause arising in a soke, it may be left for consideration how far it is connected with the Sanskrit sakh, to acquire, to gain, and so in reality be the term given by the Sakasens to the land held by a soc-iety in common.* In the latter case the socmen are the sakyah, or friends in occupation, and mutual assistants in everything relating to the socn or society; for that all these words are connected by a prevailing idea of conception can be doubted by none but a minute grammarian.† It is not very improbable that what Tacitus calls a pagus was socn, for it was governed by a gesidh or a gisindo, who was elected by the people to administer right and justice.

The original socmen, it is evident, held their land on a condition of equality among each other, and were bound only to observe the laws established by their appointed gesidh; whence arose the terms abovementioned, sidhesocna, gesidhes-socna, meaning the jurisdiction of that nobleman. A cause of dispute arising in the socn, was called a sac, which is manifestly so connected with the verb sacan, to contend, to plead against, as to require no observation, that verb being probably referable to the Sanskrit terms above.

The laws enacted by the gesidh and his sidhesmen, or

* Tacit. de Mor Germ. c. 16; and Cæsar, de Bell Gall. l. vi, c. 2, l. iv, c. 2.

† Sakha, a friend, assistant, companion, and its related terms are derived "from sa, for samana, all (the world), and khya, support." Sag, to cover, whence sagocha, being of one family, of kin, related, is much more natural.

CHAP.
VIII.Burlaw.
Men.
Burschap.

assessors of whom Tacitus speaks, were denominated from the earliest period bellagines,* the lagan or laws of the bylle, equivalent to the Latin villa, and like it a retention of the Sanskrit palli, a village, place, or station. Of the primary meaning of law (Lat. lex=legs, leg-is, A.-S. lah, laga, Isl. lag, laug, log), several opinions have been given. The most common is, that it is derived from legere, to read, and its meaning is consequently stated to be that which is read; but people had laws before they knew how to read. And as legere itself corresponds with lagan, to lay down, its classical signification is secondary, and derived from the law, which is read. In this sense of a thing appointed, the preceding terms agree with the modern German gesetz, a law, an ordinance, a thing set down or appointed. The laws of a place, differing from general laws, were termed by the Northmen, bya-lagas, and in modern English bye-laws, the laws of the soen or district. In Scotland they are denominated burlaws, or byrlaws, of which Dr. Jamieson says that they are made and determined by consent of the neighbours, elected by common consent in the courts called Burlaw Courts, and in which cognition is taken of complaints between neighbour and neighbour. The men so chosen are called Burlaw Men. In Icelandic burskap is the right of citizenship, and bursprak the place of assembly. ‘Uppa burspraket tha herrar ginge (? gingo.),’ the noblemen went into the senate (Chron. Rhythm. Ihre, v. Bur.). The Icelandic word bya lag, signifies laws of villages or townships (Von Troil’s Letters, p. 115).†

Sidesman.

4. The vassals assisting in the court of the baron, the successor of the gesidh, are often mentioned in ancient records as Judices curiæ,‡ but of their original name the only remembrance is preserved in the English sidesman,

* Jornand. de Rebus Get. c. 12.

† Etymol. Dict. v. Burlaw.

‡ Testa de Nevill’, passim. “Duodecim judices,” in the Laws of Hen. I. c. 6.

defined to be the assistant of a churchwarden. All our lexicographers, except Dr. Richardson, who omits it altogether, consider it as formed of side and man, and they explain it to be assistant or abettor. Dr. Jamieson, on the word sydesman, observes that "syde, as conjoined with man, is evidently used in the sense of the Teut. sijde, pars, factio." This meaning of sijde, however, is only secondary, and furnishes no other notion than the present English form of the same word, in its secondary acceptation of part or party. Sider, employed by Sheldon, is the regular English name of an abettor. "Such converts," says this writer in 1616, "are sure to be beset with diverse sorts of adversaries; as papists and their siders."* This application of the word arises from the use of side as a verb:—

—In any country, friend,
Where I have sided with my superiors.†

According to Dr. Webster there is the authority of Milton for sidesman as a party-man; but does not this proceed from a misconception of its etymology? In all other cases, side forms true compounds, such as sidewind, sidebox, sideboard, and sidesaddle, to which may be added the Scottish cantword sidedish. A whole people is never guilty of a solecism in language, and there must have been an original reason for the appearance of sidesman. The office of a person so called seems analogous to that of the sidhesmen in the court of the sidhesocn; he is annually elected to assist the churchwardens in their inquiry and presentment of such offenders as are amenable to the spiritual court. When the sidhesocn became a barony, the vassals who assisted in the court were called the *jury*men of the court baron or the court leet; but as the same persons were also the assistants of the churchwardens, who were usually ecclesiastics, it is not improbable that the original

* Mirror of Antichrist, in Dr. Richardson.

† Ford, Lady's Trial, Act I, sc. 1, Ib.

CHAP.
VIII.

name of sidhesmen adhered to them. Dr. Jamieson has an extract from an instrument of obligation, copied from the Memorie of the Somervilles (Vol. I, 234), in which sydesman appears to bear much of its ancient signification :—

“Be it kend, &c. me, Thomas of Killpatrick, laird of Closseburne, and sydesman to ane honourable lord, John Lord Somervill, for all the dayes of my life ; and obleidges and binds me to the said lord, be the faith of my body.”

Gisindo.

5. Probably about the time that the Saxon gesidh adopted the title of king's thegn, the gisindo of the Germans became a graff, taking that title from the jurisdiction which he exercised over his township or hundred, as a judge. The former title had a military origin, while the most ancient monuments of the latter bear testimony to its civil import. Paul Warnefrid especially notices that the Bavarians called a comes, i. e. a gisindo, by the title of gravio ;* and in the Ripuarian code, comes is pointedly distinguished from grafio.† Were it not for the evidence of Tacitus, that the prince's companions were the persons sent to administer laws in the territories committed to them, with the aid of one hundred of the common people for assessors, it might be supposed that two different grades were implied by these terms. In one of the Ripuarian Laws, both words are used, and comes is given as the interpretation of grafio, a fiscal judge.‡ With respect to the distinction just mentioned, it should be noticed that by the terms of the law, the comes residing in judicio, in his province, appears to be considered to be superior to the grafio, who as a fiscal judge had no constant abode. At this time, therefore, there were a count judiciary and a grafio, a name which by no means denotes a count, but a fiscal judge. When the title of gisindo was relinquished, and that of greve, grave, and latterly graff, was assumed, it must have been in consequence of the conjunction of the two offices in the count judiciary.

* Hie (Alachis) dum dux esset in Tridentina civitate, cum comite Baioariorum, quem illi gravionem dicunt, qui Bauzanum et reliqua castella regebat, confligit, eumque mirifice superavit. — De Longob. l. v, c. 36, p. 198.

† —Jubemus ut nullus optimatum Major domus, Domesticus, Comes, Grafio, Cancellarius, &c.—Tit. 88.

‡ Tit. 53. “De eo qui Grafionem interfecerit.—1. Si quis Judicem Fiscalem, quem Comitem vocant, interfecerit, sexcentis solidis mulctetur.”

6. There can be little or no doubt from the signification of the title tun-greve, that though it latterly denoted no more than bailiff of a manor, the person who bore this appellation was the principal officer of the town, and what is now called a mayor in corporate towns. In the usual way of conjectural etymology, Wachter fixes upon the Keltic maer, villicus, which appears to mean both a husbandman and a steward of a city; and he quotes the opinion of Goldast, that a great number of German nobles sprang from this class.* There is no doubt a correspondence in the Keltic maer, Germ. meier, Low Lat. major, Fr. maire, which may perhaps be accounted for that in Arabic, mar, signifies a great lord. Mayor will then denote the lord of a town, and the etymology explain why some are termed lord-mayors; while mayoress finds an exact counterpart in the majorissa of the Salic Law.† A Saxon tun appears to have been what was afterwards termed a manor; and where any considerable number of houses stood upon the manor, that portion having the tungreves court, retained the name tun, a town. Hence, in old English, the lord of a manor seems to be equally denominated lord of the town:

Tungreve.
Mayor.

Erles and barons, bishops plenerly

Knyghtes, lordes of tounes, and alle com to his crie.‡

* "Villici majores et ἀπλως majores, Alamannis etiamnum Meyer, erant rusticarum possessionum et villarum administratores. Erant autem villici isti majoribus ab initio ex plebe et vulgo; postea progressionem facta, cum a dominis suis, non principibus tantum, sed vero baronibus et nobilibus, prædia in beneficium sive feudum, ut juris-consulti loquuntur, accepissent, eo titulo etiam nobilitatem sibi vindicare cœperunt, quo ex fonte infinita nobilium profluxit multitudo."—De Reb. Alaman. t. II, p. 115.

† Lex Sal. tit. xi, n. 7.

‡ Robert of Brunne, p. 279.

CHAP.
VIII.Bailiff.

On every Rajpoot estate, there is a mer, a kind of maire de palais, who has military command over the vassals.

7. The bailiff is an officer whose name bears the odor of antiquity; it is used as a translation of the Saxon gerefa, in the sense of governor of a province, and sometimes it seems to correspond with the gravio of the Franks, and the thiufad of the Visigoths. In old English, baly is the jurisdiction of a bailiff, who was often high in rank and official employment:—

“ Sir Jon of Warene, he is chef justice,
Sir Henry Percy kepes Galwaye.
These two had baly of these londes tueye.”*

This term has been derived from the Latin bajulus, whence it is said comes bailus, a judge or governor of a district; but bailus is the same word as bailli, or bailiff, and bajulus among the Romans was a porter. The derivation, however, may be collaterally correct: the bailiff was no doubt so called originally from being the bearer of the prince's bhala or lance, as the ensign of his deputed authority. At the present day, the bhala, is the sign manual of the hereditary premier of state of Mewar, in Rajasthan. It is to this most ancient custom of delivering a lance or spear in the way of commission, before the invention of writing, that we find rods, wands, batons, and other instruments used to denote the possession of office. The botwand, says Dr. Jamieson, is a rod such as officers, and especially marshals, used to carry in ancient times among the Gothic nations, where the men capable to bear arms were summoned to attend their general, a messenger was sent, who with the greatest expedition was to carry a rod through a certain district, and deliver it in another, and so on, till all the quarters of the country were warned. This rod had certain marks cut upon it, which were often unknown to the messenger, but intelligible to the principal persons, to whom he was sent. These marks indicated the time and place of meeting. The rod was burnt at one end, and a rope affixed to the other, as intimating the fate of those who should disobey the summons, that their houses should be burnt, and that themselves should be hung. This was called in Su. G. budkafle, from bud, a message, and kafle, a rod.* The more ancient custom, which is noticed by Ihre and the Swedish antiquaries, was strictly analagous to the Asiatic bhala, consisted in sending round an arrow, called the herör, or arrow of war, as indication to the feodatories to arm their vassals, and attend the chief to the field.

* Robert of Brunne, p. 280.

The bearer of these missions may have been termed bailiff, and thus bajulus have come to denote a porter or servant among the Romans. In like manner the person honoured with the lance or bhala of power, was certainly so called from that circumstance; and thus in subsequent times he that was commissioned by the prince or great man to act in his stead, was called a bailiff, although he had neither lance nor rod to denote his authority. In old German, it is to be noticed that stab, a staff, or a letter, also signified judgment, possibly because a staff was the ensign of a judge.

Apparently the bailiff was the Missus Regis of the Germans, there being no equivalent term in Latin, except bajulus, which had acquired too mean a signification to be applied to an officer entrusted with superior authority.

* Etymol. Dict. art. Botwand.

CHAPTER IX.

Household Dignities and Offices, high and low.

- 1.—PALATINE or PALACE COUNTS. Origin of the names of buildings, &c.
 2.—Palace. 3.—Tower, Castle. 4.—Comes palatii; henchman. 5.—
 STEWARD, spencer, larderer. 6.—BUTLER, pincerna, bouteiller; skin-ker; byrel; seneschal; tapster; dapifer; dishbearer. 7.—Graff, greve, gerefæ. 8.—MARQUIS, banner lords. 9.—Lords Marches. 10.—Senior, senhor. 11.—Constable and Marshal. 12.—MARSHAL, horse keeper; horse page, horse knave, avenor, hostler, farrier. 13.—Treasurer. 14.
 —Commodore, Ducarius, admiral; Valvasor.

CHAP.
 IX.

 PALACE
 COUNTS.

1. In attempting to ascertain the import of primitive terms, it would occasion error to forget that languages were spoken before men had made any considerable progress in civilization; and that the appellations which they gave to the objects of their necessities and conveniences in their rudest forms, remained unchanged when those objects had received improvements and embellishments, because the latter were only occasional and of gradual growth. The block of wood or stump of a tree, which served for a seat, was called a stool, from its firmness and solidity, and when in a subsequent age, it was modelled into a stately chair, and decorated with purple and gold for the monarch, it was still called a stool, (stol, a stool, a throne), a name which now adheres only to the rudest form of a seat. To illustrate this by other familiar examples would be superfluous, if the examples themselves did not also conduce to a knowledge of the subject under inquiry.

Men were compelled to seek for shelter from the inclemency of the weather long before the invention of the art of building. They were huntsmen and herdsmen, and they clad themselves in the skins and hides of beasts; or they were husbandmen, and fashioned garments of leaves and bark. The same substances employed on a larger scale, served for the construction of permanent as well as temporary shelter or retreats; and what is not extraordinary, the names of the materials suggested the appellations of their dwellings, and are the original of the words in present use for the very same purpose.

Spreading a skin, called in Sanskrit twak and twach, from tree to tree, Sansk. kuta and kutha, the Sakasen hunter contrived a temporary hut with a thatch or roof. When this became his constant residence, he called it kuti a house, a hut, Germ. hütte, and probably covered it with bark of trees, also called twak and twach. This is the first idea of the Latin tego, tectum, the A.-Sax. theccan, to cover over, thecen, a roof, the Iceland. thakka, Germ. decken, dach, and English thatch. Or he covered it with dry leaves, uda, and called it uttaja, a cottage; or his thatch consisted of meadow grass, ghasa, which originated the Latin casa, explained to be a house of leaves, the Germ. haus, A.-S. and Icel. hus, Engl. house.

More majestic dwellings were constructed with salas, branches of trees, apparently larger than the kuta. At all events a house of this kind was called sala, the A.-S. sal, and Icel. salr, a hall or palace, Germ. saal, an upper room, Fr. salon, and perhaps Engl. soller. The Gr. aule, Lat. aula, a hall, and the Goth. alh, a temple, usually classed with these words by etymologers, who ought to know better, are the Sanskrit alayam, a hall, of which the meaning is contained in Aldor and its cognates. Cutting down trees, they made beams (Sanskrit bhim, a prop), and working still more elaborately, they called the house, not from its materials, but the pains bestowed upon it; and thus came the Latin domus = (Eng.) timber = (Germ.) zimmer. The Greek demos, a house, demo, to build, and Goth. timrian, are radically the same with the preceding, from the Sanskrit tam, to subdue and place in order.

Acquiring a greater degree of skill in architecture, men

CHAP.
IX.

united together, and with huge blocks of unhewn stone (O. N. hallir), they erected the gloomy hall, of which the earliest notice places it among rocks and fells, with a dark path to it:—

“Reid hann meir thadan
myrkvann veg
heilig fiöll
unz at hóllo kom.”

Thence farther he rode,
by a darksome way,
up snow-capt hills,
till he came to the hall.

Rigsmal, v. 37.

When a number of these dwellings were got together, a villa was formed, in Sanskrit palli, Norse byle, a little habitation; A.-S. bol-d and bol-t, a house, a village. Some surrounded the vill with a circular fence, hof, in Germ., and hoppa, in A.-Sax., a hoop, etymologically, though not in sense, corresponding with the square formed cubus of the Romans. The German hof gave name to the royal residence in after times; but some named the vill from the materials of the enclosure or fence; in Goth. gazds, a goad, equivalent to the Latin hasta, a spear; and gazds is the same word as the A.-Sax. geard, a yard, Norse gardr, a city, a region; and gorod in the termination of Novogorod and the names of other cities. The gardr, like cities in general, was a fortification; and other Scandinavians calling the stakes, haslar, from the hazle tree, produced the word hasl=castellum, from castrum, Latin.*

Palace.

2. That the first palace was nothing more than a rude enclosure of stakes driven into the ground, from that circum-

* From hasl, is formed at hasla, or hasla, to mark out a place for a pitched battle, which the Northmen performed with hazel stangs or stakes, and they called the place itself heslisteingi, q. d. castle-stakes or pales. “Skamt fra hofinni vari settar up heslisteingur thar sem orrostan skyldi vera.” Shortly from the court were the hazel stangs set up where the battle was to be.—Norna Gests Saga, c. 6. The first castr-a=(hasl-ar) were no better than tents within a palisade. Hasla vollr, the plain of hazels, also occurs for a battle field: “Lagdi jall scipom sinom at landi, oc hasladhi voll Ragnfredi kongi.” The Jarl laid his ships on the land, and staked out a field of battle for king Rainfred.—Heims Kringla, t. 1, p. 212.

stance named by the Anglo Saxons a fæsten, a fastness, or fortress, is pretty well ascertained from the origin of the word, whether we consider it as the old German falanza, or the Latin palatium. The latter is commonly said in classical books to have been taken from the Palatine Hill, but this is deriving cart from carthorse. Palatinus, as Selden observes, respecting the word in a count of the royal household, "is the possessive of palatium, and implies no more than the words of the household, when we say 'officers of the household.' "* On Latin principles, therefore, this etymology of palatium cannot be commended. The Romans long before they arrived at the Palatine Hill, must have protected themselves by castra, and palatia are nothing more than castra, considered in regard to the paling or palissado, and not in regard to hasl, its material. They are however, said to have first established themselves on the Palatine Hill, and if any part of the story of Romulus be true, the "Romana palatia," committed to the care of "mother Vesta," could not have been stone edifices, but a collection of huts of the simplest construction, such as at a recent period were erected by hordes of banditti on the hills and mountains in the neighbourhood of Rome. In the same manner as the castellum, the residence of the pastoral marauders was protected by a circle of stakes or piles. Such a stake the Romans called pal(us), and the Germans pfal or phal.† In old German, fala was a wooden tower, and phala, which however, is the same word and the cognate of the Latin palus, was a wooden castle.‡ In old

* Titles of Honour, p. 378.

† From the root PAL, to preserve, Sanskrit Grammarians, deduce palala, a stalk, a straw, and palali, a straw. The pal-us takes its name from its use as a stake, when it bears a resemblance to a stalk; or directly from the root PAL, when it denotes part of a fence. The Persian palar is the highest beam of a house which supports the roof.

‡ Schilter, not perceiving that the words were radically the same, derives phala, a wooden castle, from the Latin palus.—Thesaur. Antiquit. Teuton, t. III, p. 654. Wachter, finding that Festus connects fala with altitude,

CHAP.
IX.

German also, a statelier building was called a falanza—paland-us,* (Lat. propped up with poles); and, resembling it, the Low Latin palancatum, Italian palanchato, was what the French under the same notion, call a pallisade, that is a stockade or fortification of pales. In classical Latin the n was dropped, and the word palatium, as if it were palat-um, formed of pales, answering to the German pfaltz, and pallast, a palace, likewise produced by dropping the n of the ancient orthography. The palancatum, just mentioned, was a fence of pales around what is now denominated a city; Muratori quotes a memorial, dated 1238, in which this kind of fence is termed a palancatum.† Omitting the n and doubling the l, the writers of the middle ages had pallatium and pallicium, still meaning the encompassing pallisade. Palus, in the Alamannic Laws, was a sharp piece of wood driven into the ground to support a fence,‡ and in the Laws of the Longobards “nudus ad palum vapulari,” was a phrase to denote the punishment of a slave by flagellation on his bare back, at the pale or farthest extent of the enclosure.§ Palatium, however, had condemns this derivation, and suggests the Icelandic fiall, a mountain, as the etymon of the German phala; but fiall is the English fell, and German fels, a rock, and consequently cannot also be the German pfal. The conception of fiall, fell, fels, &c., related as these words are to falla, fallen, &c., refers to declivity, and not to height.

* Notker has falanza, a hall; but others write palantz and pfallantz. See Wachter, who also quotes palinz hus, a house of palings, the translation of prætorium in Ottfried:—

Giang er selbo ingegin uz
Thar zi themo palinz hus.
He went himself out to meet Them there at the paling house.

Lib. IV, c. 20, v. 5, 6.

† Et ipsi Brixenses suspenderunt captos imperatoris pro brachiis extra palancatum civitatis.—Apud Du Cange, in voc.

‡ L. Al. tit. 99, n. 24.

§ L. Long. lib. 1, c. 25, n. 4. The pale or stake driven into the ground was also used as a boundary mark.—Du Cange, t. V, c. 85. The palanchato, Fr. planche, Engl. plank, differed from the pale in being unpointed ages before this, acquired the signification of a large and stately edifice. The process is obvious. As the Roman settlement upon the Latian hill increased in wealth and power, the huts of the population became houses, and the houses of the patres became strongholds. They occupied the same site as the pallisades, which had become feared or celebrated throughout the neighbouring country. No exertion of human authority can change the language of a people. They continued to call the new structures by the name which they had given to the enclosures.

3. The splendour of the modern palace has dazzled the eyes of etymologists, who do not reflect that language was spoken before the dawn of civilization. They also err who believe the palace to have been originally turris, by which the Romans used to denote a burgh or tower. It is mistaking the whole for one of its parts. This word corresponds with Sanskrit dwarra, Arab. dar, Gr. thura, Slav. dver, Goth. daur or dauro, a door or gate: and if the principal part of the Romans consisted of a colony of Sabines, Curetes, Quirites or Courlanders, it was imported into Italy in the Lettic and O. Prussian form of durris, which nearly resembles the present Lithuanian durrys. The durr, turr, door or gate, was that part of the palisade, which being from its use as a passage, weaker than the rest, was strengthened by a lofty stig or stage, whence the armed warders might cast down missiles on a besieging party.*

Tower.

and flat. A row or circle of pales, planks, or piles (the pali of the Alamanic Law above), interwoven with twigs, and the interstices filled up with earth, forms a barrier resembling cloth (hrægl, a vestment), and in English, at least, is a rail. Barrier is from bar, which is s-par, without the sibilant.

The German derivation runs parallel with the Latin; phal, a pale, pile, stake, as appears from fala, must have been originally fal, hence falantz, a palace; then pfal, whence pfaltz and pallast. Lastly from pile we have Peel, and Pile, of Powderie.

* Hig fuhton fif dagas
swa hyra nan ne feol

They fought five days
as none fell

CHAP.
IX.

This fortified entrance was called the dwara in Sanskrit, from dur, hard, difficult, bad to force, and it belonged equally to the Roman castrum, the palace, and to the Gothic burgh, a castle or walled city. The Northmen called it a kastali,* a word which is not at all connected with castrum and castellum, but is formed from the verb kasta, to throw, and expresses one of the chief purposes for which it was intended. A band of depredators, on issuing from their fastness, would necessarily leave a guard over their property in their absence. The chief of such a band, in however rude a state it might be, would by a like necessity place more confidence in one than another; and we know that these chiefs were attended by gesidhas or gisindon, who accompanied them in war, and who administered justice in parts where they were not present. It may therefore be reasonably concluded that from the most remote ages, there has existed a palace count, the pfaltzgraf, paltsgrove, of the Germans, under some denomination of like import, or of an import connected with his duty as a warden, a judge, a comptroller of the household, and general adjutant of his principal. The præfectus prætorium of the old Romans, was originally no other than the warder of the turretted entrance to the primitive palace.† Præfectus corresponds in signification, and partly in etymology with the Gothic andbaht-s, a minister, a prætor, whence

driht gesidha
ac hig tha duru heoldon.

of the lordly companions,
but they held the gates.

Fragment in Hickes, t. I, p. 192.

* ‘Thad var eirn morgon i solar uppras ad Hervor stod vp à kastala synum, ifer borgarhlidhi.’ It was one morning at sunrise that Hervor was standing upon her turret over the city gate.—Herv. Saga, c. 19, fo. 15.

† Speaking of the simple paltsgrove or palace count, with a territory annexed to his title, Selden says, “The title or name only of the first is to be deduced out of the custom and style of the old French state, as from its first original, though yet the name of it were more ancient, and that in the Roman empire under the name of præfectus prætorii.”—Titles of Honour, p. 379. The palace count, without the territory, he says positively, is “to be originally had from the example of the old Roman empire.”

prætorium, taken from a palace, is literally its court-yard, præ-turre, and exactly corresponds with the Gothic faura-daure, the space of ground occupied by the guard at the gate way. The hof-gesind of the Germans, the hofdreingr of the Northmen, the heorth geneat,* bord geneat, and heall thegn† of the Anglo Saxons, bear testimony to the employment of a palace minister, with a title of similar import with respect to the situation of the bearer.

4. The highest of the dignities denoted by graf, is that of pfaltz-graf, a judge of the palace, or palatine judge; but the Latin comes palatii is a count of the palace, count or companion palatine, as if the title were pfaltzgesind. According to Selden, the title of count palatine, with a territory annexed to it, was known in England under the Normans. He considers it to be a copy of the comes palatii of the first race of French kings,‡ and therefore, notwithstanding its resemblance to the Roman præfect of the prætorium, it was in respect of France, a German institution. Both Romans and Germans brought the office and its appellation from Asia. The Persians had a basilius oikou or governor of the household;§ and, in fact, wherever a chief had a large establishment of companions and servants, lodged and entertained in his herberge, whether that were an enclosure of stakes, or a burgh of stones dis-

Comes Palatii.

* Suprà, p. 158, line 13.—Hofdreingr. Hof, a court, and dreingr, a valiant man. See the particular signification of dreng, Suprà, p. 159, 160.

† Heall-thegn, hall-thane, palace minister:—

Næfre he on aldor dagum	Never he in all his life,
ær ne sidhthan	before or since,
heardran hæle	found bolder men,
heal thegnas fand.	keepers of the hall.

Beowulf, 1429.

Kemble.

Heall-gesidh, before the title of thegn superseded it, would correspond with a German hof-gesindo, superseded by graf, and hof by pfaltz, without affecting the conventional meaning.

‡ Titles of Honour, p. 379.

§ Sozomen. l. 11, c. 9, Apud Du Cange.

CHAP.
IX.

posed in a circle, one of them would necessarily preside over the rest, and have the care of the "goods and chattels,"* with the superintendence of the rations of meat and drink, and thus become associated with the chief in the adjustment of differences among the retainers, or in causes brought for determination to the head quarters of the horde. With respect to the household he would be the foreman, with respect to the habitation, the palace count, master of the house, or minister of the hall, and with respect to the Henchman chief and his own family, a henchman.† This officer in

* Suprà, p. 94, n.

† On the supposition that it agrees with either the Norse hondgengr man, a courtier; or hensi and man, hensisman, a noble minister; or the Swedish hion, A.-Sax. hine, servant and man. In the former, a man at hand, a handy-man, is the leading idea; in the second, man or minister of the family is the idea. If Drs. Percy and Blackstone be right, "henchman, quasi haunchman, one that goes behind another," the reference is to the chieftain himself:—

"And every knight had after him riding, Thre henshmen on him awaiting."

Chaucer.

It may, however, be hengst-man, horse-man, and so came to be an esquire, as Spelman suggests. The etymology is perplexing when we avoid the natural suggestion of the word itself, in order that we may not affix the dishonor which in modern times attaches itself to the executioner. The superintendence of capital executions in palaces has from all ages in the East been entrusted to the captain of the guards, and the provost marshal of European armies. Henchman seems to be nothing more than hengi man or hengsman,—such was Benaiah to king David (1 Kings 1 & 2). An Aga of Janissaries was the same. The hencker, or henck-man of the Germans was a person of rank, or a cadet of condition up to the fifteenth century; and it was not until the sixteenth century that that custom of executing criminals adjudged in the Fehmgericht, by the younger judges of that court, was abolished by Eric, Duke of Brunswick, who died in 1540. Our old historians have an enumeration of the household of king Hardeknute, on which an observation may be made applicable to the subject of the hengc-man:—

"Rex Hardecnutes
Alfricum, Eboracensem Archiepiscopum, Godwinum Comitem,
Styr, Majorem domus, Thronð, suum Carnificem,

the early French palace was known by a great variety of names, as "Gubernator palatii, moderator palatii, magister palatii, palatii præfectus, rector palatii, comes palatii, dux palatii;" and "dux Francorum;"* which last seems to attest its origin in the Franks, so far as the Gallo-Romans are concerned.

CHAP.
IX.

5. In large establishments, several officers performed the duties which in smaller, and at an earlier period, were committed to one. To this circumstance may be ascribed the multiplicity of appellations denoting the same office, and the apparent anomaly of an officer of one denomination appearing in a capacity, which, if the appellation alone afforded a sufficient guide, was due to another, as where a marshal or a stable count administers justice, and a palace count or a master of the household leads the forces. The palace count of the Franks, in the preceding enumeration of titles, was a ruler, governor and master of the palace, a majordomo, or maire de palais, and a majordomo was a Steward.

Edricum, Dispensatorem, et alios

magnæ dignitatis viros Londonum misit."

—Hoveden, Script. post Bed. p. 438. Spelman quotes thus much of the passage, and observes that the words are those of Florence of Worcester, Ann. 1040, and that Carnifex was a splendid appellation of office among our Saxons. He evidently understood the word in its classical acceptation of an executioner; but Du Cange, on the same passage, thinks that Thronde was the great or master cook. The entire passage is to this effect, that king Hardecnute sent Abp. Alfric, earl Godwin, Styr, his major domus, Thronde, his executioner, and Edric, his steward, and other men of high rank, to London, to dig up the body of king Harold and throw it into a ditch. Afterwards the body was taken out and cast into the Thames. In the middle ages a carnifex was "homicida vel macellator qui facit carnes," a manslayer, and a butcher who cut up and sold meat. Now a cook may be a butcher, but it is very unlikely that a royal cook would be also an executioner, or employed in disinterring bodies; and that Thronde was one, may be inferred from the nature of his errand. In the household of Henry II. carnifices are distinct from the cocus or cook, and were evidently butchers.

* Fredegarius; Paul Warnefrid; Godfried. Viterbens; Eiginhard; Aimoin, &c. See Du Cange, v. Major Domus.

CHAP.
IX.

Steward.

steward, of which Mr. Richardson says in the Encycloped. Metropolit. that it was “antiently written stede-ward.”

He produces no authority, nor indeed, is there any, as stiweard occurs in Anglo-Saxon, and he himself quotes Robert of Brunne, p. 10:—

“Britik had a stivard, his name was Hermon.”

This last term, which in Ælfric's Glossary, answers to the Latin æconomus, which is the same as rector or major domus, appears to be of very remote antiquity. To acquire a just notion of its early import, the assistance of etymology must be sought. In the Anglo Saxon Chronicle, we read of the earl's stiward, and the kinges stiward. The same orthography was commonly observed in old English:

“The kyng com into halle,
Among his knyghtes alle,
Forth he clepeth Athebrus,
His stiward, and him seide thus:
Stiward, tac thou here
My fundling for to lere
Of some mysteres of ryvere.*

A MS. statute of Richard III. (c. 6,) quoted by Dr. Stodart, has styward:—

“That every styward, under styward, bailiff, commissarie, or other mynystre, holdynge and rulynge any of the said courtes, that doth the contrary of this ordenance, shall forfeit an C s.”

Among our old writers u was sometimes equal to y; in Launfal Miles, MS. we have stuward:—

“He gaf of gyftes largeliche
Gold and sylver, and clodes ryche,
To squyer and to knygt;
For hys largesse and his bounte
The knyges stuward made was he Ten yer, y you pligt.†

* Geste of Kyng Horn. Warton has copied this passage erroneously.

† Cott. MS. Caligula, A. II, fo. 33 b.

The derivation of this compound word is attended with a difficulty respecting its initial syllable, which may perhaps be removed by a consideration of the circumstances in which a Teutonic horde were placed when they instituted military guardians or defenders, for that such was the steward originally appears from the latter part of the appellation. Icelandic stivardr, a word of the same formation and signification, is said to be derived from "stia, opus, and vardr, custos."* But custos is a secondary meaning of vardr, which results from verja, to defend, a verb formed with the word ver, a man, and, therefore, primarily signifying to act as a man, to act manfully, viriliter agere. So also the weard of the Saxons proceeds from werian, and werian from wer. Stiward means a keeper of the sti or stia certainly, but it is a keeper with arms in his hands. If stia mean opus in Icelandic, it can be only in the sense that weorc in Anglo Saxon, work in English, and ouvrage in French, are taken to be the fortification, which is the product of work: thus the hall, palace and castle of Heorot, in Beowulf, is a work:—

"Tha ic wide gefrægn weorc gebannan manigre mægthe
geond thisne middan geard."

Then widely I learn the work was proclaimed to many a tribe
throughout this earth.

A place of defence and security among the German nations, when the site was the leading idea, was called by the same word which denoted a rock or mountain. In Gothic bairgs, a mountain, is connected with the verb bairgan, to guard, keep, preserve, whence baurgs, a fortified place, a city, in Old Norse, the same word berg, bearg, and

* Metrop. Encyclop. art. Grammar, p. 189. Stia occurs in Gautreks Saga, c. 31, for a sheep cote, or a stall for cattle; but who will accept this as the original of an office of the highest dignity in a royal and imperial palace? It is this stia which enters into composition with pig and swine, in the several dialects, and is more likely to be connected with stow, a place, than any word denoting ascent, such as stig.

CHAP.
IX.
Steward. biarg is both a rock and a tower, and the related verb biarga, is to assist, protect; borg a city, manifestly involves the same idea as baurgs. In German berg, a hill or mountain is connected by an old verb with burg, a castle, which is the same as the Anglo-Saxon burg, a place of defence, connected with beorh, a mountain, through the verb beorgan, to defend. A tower is also called purgos in Greek, which by those who believe that the language of Homer ever penetrated to the frozen rocks of a Scandinavian coast, is, contrary to the canon of transition, confidently stated to be the original of a word so widely diffused and so closely united to its root, as burg or burgh; but in Greek, purgos is an isolated word, connected with none but its own little progeny of derivatives. It has no root in that language, and must therefore depend for its explanation upon its agreement with the Gothic cognates.*

The etymological import of burgh is strikingly confirmed by the remains of primitive fortresses, erected upon the summits of precipitous rocks, and the most inaccessible points of rugged mountains in Scandinavia, the Danish Islands, some parts of Germany, and our own Zetland Islands. Of these the most perfect specimen, according to Sir Walter Scott, is that upon the island of Mousa, near to the main land of Zetland, which, he says, "is probably in the same state as when inhabited."

Descrip- "It is a single round tower, the wall curving in slightly,

* In Arabic, burj and buruj, a castle, tower, fortress, wall, &c. are connected with the preposition bar, above, and like our burgh, mean an elevated place. The words burgh, burgher, borough, come from the Anglo-Saxon burh, a city, which is the Sanskrit puri, a city, i. e. a place become full (pur) of inhabitants. There is another bond of connection among these different terms. Where the burgh was erected, the people naturally frequented it for protection, and for the same reason built their habitations there; and thus burgh, a castle, a town or city, was also an elevated place. Purgos does not correspond with the Gothic baurgs, A.-S. burh, for P Gr. answers to Goth. F, and G Gr. to H or G Goth. Hence FAIRHW-us, Goth., in some restricted sense, is the correspondent of purgos.

and then turning outward again in the form of a dice box, so that the defenders on the top might the better protect the base. It is formed of rough stones, selected with care, and laid in courses or circles with much compactness, but without cement of any kind. The tower has never, to appearance, had roofing of any sort; a fire was made in the centre of the space which it encloses, and originally the building was probably little more than a wall drawn as a sort of screen around the great council fire of the tribe. But although the means or ingenuity of the builders did not extend so far as to provide a roof, they supplied the want by constructing apartments in the interior of the walls of the tower itself. The circumvallation found a double enclosure, the inner side of which was, in fact, two or three feet distant from the other, and connected by a concentric range of long flat stones, thus forming a series of concentric rings or stories of various heights, rising to the top of the tower. Each of these stories or galleries had four windows, facing directly to the points of the compass, and rising of course regularly above each. These four perpendicular ranges of windows admitted air, and, the fire being kindled, heat, or smoke at least, to each of the galleries. The access from gallery to gallery is equally primitive. A path on the principle of an inclined plain, turns round and round the building like a screw, and gives access to the different stories, intersecting each of them in its turn, and thus gradually rising to the top of the wall of the tower. On the outside there are no windows; and I may add, that an enclosure of a square, or sometimes a round form, gave the inhabitants an opportunity to secure any sheep or cattle which they might possess."

According to the aspect under which the burgh was viewed, so was it denominated. Considering its circular, hoop-like form, it was a hof; as it was constructed of stone it was a hall; seated upon a rock or mountain, it was a burg, while the winding ascent to the apartments in the walls suggested, says Mallet, "a name which signified

CHAP. IX.
 ———
 Steward. serpents or dragons.”* The Goths called an ascending path, staiga, the Anglo-Saxons, stig, the Swedes, stje, from verbs which signify to ascend; and in Lancashire to this day, a portable ladder, used for obtaining access to the loft or upper room of an outbuilding, is called a stee or steigh. If the whole building were also called by the name of this important part, we can understand why the officer in charge of it was designated the stivandr and stiward.

Access to the burgh was obtained by means of a similar stie, winding in some instances round the rock or mountain, but in others cut through it so as to form a cavernous ascent into the inner tower. “In Zetland,” says Sir W. Scott, “there are several scores of these Burghs, occupying in every case, capes, headlands, islets, and similar places of advantage singularly well chosen. I remember the remains of one upon an island in a small Lake near Lerwick, which at high tide communicates with the sea, the access to which is very ingenious, by means of a causeway or dike, about three or four inches under the surface of the water. This causeway makes a sharp angle in its approach to the Burgh. The inhabitants, doubtless, were well acquainted with this, but the strangers, who might approach in a hostile manner, and were ignorant of the curve of the causeway, would probably plunge into the lake, six or seven feet in depth at the least. This must have been the device of some Vauban or Cohorn of those early times.”

Reference to these staigai, stigas, or sties, are found in many old writers:—

The passage to the noted hall of Heorot, in Beowulf, lay through a street, and up a stie:—

Stræt wæs stan fah stig wisode
 gumnum ætgædere.

L. 537.

The street was variegated with stones, the path directed the men together:

* Introd. à l'Hist. de Dannemarc, t. II, ch. 9, p. 243.

so that Heorot resembled the Saxon castle of Conigsburgh, of which the entrance was a narrow door at a great height from the ground, and attained by a long flight of steps. This conjecture appears to receive confirmation from a subsequent passage:—

CHAP.
IX.

Steward.

He to healle geng
stod on stapole
geseah steapne hrof golde fahne.

He went to the hall,
stood on the steps,
and beheld the steep roof with gold adorned.

L. 1844.

The subterranean stie is mentioned in the account of the dragon's burgh. This guardian of hidden treasures possessed—

stan beorh stearcne stig under læg
eldum uncuth.

a strong stone burgh;
the stie lay under it,
unknown to men.

L. 4421.

This fable of a dragon guarding a treasure in a strong burgh, it will be perceived is the allegory of a powerful and tyrannical castellan in his own right, suggested by the serpentine stie by which he ascended to the different lofts (from lopt or luft, air) in the walls. The covered or concealed path also occurs in the description of a magnificent manor, quoted by Warton, from a poem of the thirteenth century:—

“ Forth heo wenten on the feld
To an hul (hill) thei bi held
The eorthe clewet as a scheld,
On the grownde greene:
Sone fonde thei on (a) stigh,
Thei went theron radly;
The Crysten mon hedde farly
What hit might mene.
After that stig lay a strete
Clere i pavet with grete,
Thei fond a manere that was mete
With murthes ful schene.”

Stye, that is an ordinary ascending path, is contrasted with street, a horizontal passage, in the poem of Emare, also quoted by Warton:—

CHAP.
IX.

Steward.

“ Messengeres forth he sent Aftyr the mayde fayre and gent
 That was brygt as someres day :
 Messengeres dygt hem in hye
 With myche myrthe and melodye ;
 Forth gon thei fare
 Both bi stretes and bi stye
 After that fayr lady.”*

If stia be opus, then are stia and stig Icelandic and Saxon names of the Burgh so called from the Serpentine ascending path, which suggested the name of a drake or a worm for the building, and the fable of a dragon or castellan or burghward; and so stiward is the warden of the ancient fortress, the keeper of the hall, and the master and count of the palace. In the old romance of Sir Ynwayn, Sir Ywain, or Gawayn, sty appears to be used for the tower to which the knight was going. The passage is quoted by Warton, but apparently with little accuracy. In a note on “legir sty,” the former of which words he explains to be “wicked, bad,” and the latter “the enchanted forest,” he says, “But I do not precisely know the meaning of sty. It is used in the Lay of Emaré,” given above. If the word be legir it cannot mean wicked, bad, but a bed or resting place. The knight having mounted his good steed, rode forth—

“ Until it neghed nere to nyght ;
 He passed many a high mountayne
 In wilderness and many a playne,
 Till he com to that legir sty
 That hym byhoved to pass by
 Than was he seker for to se
 The well and the fayre tre ;
 The chapel saw he at the laste,
 And thider hyed he full faste ;
 More curtaysli and more honowr
 Fand he with than in that towr, &c.”†

* Cott. MS. Caligula, A. II, fo. 159.

† Hist. Poet. v. III, p. 117.

However this may be, the stie, both in the interior and exterior of the burgh, was of great importance. On occasion of danger, the cattle destined for the support of the garrison were driven into the circle formed by the stie, and there kept along with other provisions for holding out a siege. It would appear then that from this use of the stiga or stye, the Icelandic stia came to denote a cattle stall; and that stiward was the officer who had the charge of the entrances and the provisions of the burgh or castle; and hence there is no difficulty in accounting for his high rank in a royal household. Horne Tooke is perfectly right in deriving stiga (meaning stig, by the way), from stigan, to ascend, but as completely in error when he defines a sty to be a raised court for hogs. This would make the steward the keeper of a hog sty. If hogs were brought into the burgh, which is very doubtful, they were kept beneath, and not upon the sty, for that would have incommoded the inhabitants; neither were words expressly invented to denominate the accommodations of that animal.

The stie, in many instances, was furnished with ropes, stiga rapas (whence stairs and stair-ropes, stirrups), to assist in passing from loft to loft. It is not in the slightest degree improbable that the lofts might also be called stigas or staigai, Gothic. In the Low Latin, stagia and stagium were terms for a house or habitation, and the French étage, anciently éstage, was a place between two planks.* Estigia was used in 1213, for hostisia, which was the same as a hospitium, a house for the reception of the poor and the sick—a hospital. The explanation of œconomus by stiward, in Ælfric's Glossary, would lead to the conclusion

* Stagia, a dwelling house, in a charter of Philip le Bel, 1298, quoted by Du Cange, VI, c. 685. In the Customs of Limousin, it is spelled stagium, and is used for a building equal to a house. "Item consuetudo est quia fullones seu sarturatores debent custodire in stagiis vel domibus suis per septem dies pannos emptos in loco ubi videri possunt publice."—Consuet. Lemovic., art. 42, ib. 687.

CHAP.
IX.

Steward.

that a house was sometimes denominated from the stie, as the burgh was with reference to the serpentine construction of that essential portion of the building. The similar word sthayuka, in Sanskrit, implying stationary, or connected with the station, is used as the title of the steward, bailiff, or overseer of a village; but stiward can hardly have had this import, if the orthography of Ælfric and the Chronicle be the original. In the first ages the officer so denominated appears, from the preceding etymology, to have been the guardian of the pass to the fortress of the tribe, so that having the command of the fortress itself, he came to be the principal and regulator of the internal establishment. This, as territory extended and circumstances improved, keeping him constantly about the person of the chieftain or prince, occasioned the appointment of an officer over the roads and passes; as the præfectus viarum of the old Romans, the comes viarum of the empire, and the Guardareve of the Normans in England. The last, whose name denotes the bailiff of the ward, was of some importance, having thirty hides of land “pur son travail,” for his labour, that is, under his superintendence, and a stretewarde of seventy men, at the rate of four from each ward.*

Spencer.

From the station of the majordomo in the palace of a king or nobleman, and the presumed station occupied in a Norse and English burgh by the steward, that officer had the care and distribution of the provisions, and in short he was the manager of the household expenses, and hence he is called, in the Latin of the early ages, a dispensator, whence the larder in old English was the Spence, and possibly Spencer, le Despenser, the name of a noble family,

* Leges Will. I, c, 28. Jacob strangely supposes the stretewarde to have been scavengers. They were the armed guardians of such public roads as then existed, and were no doubt rendered necessary by reason of the discontented Saxons, who traversed the country in formidable bands under Hereward and other noted leaders, during the whole of this and the subsequent reigns.

may have denominated the steward, the master of the household, the count palatine and paltgrave, in his capacity of larderer, or one that took care of bacon in early times.* It matters not that these offices are found filled by very different persons with as many titles; the fact that one or the other name is found designating him who is both a palace count and a majordomo, is a proof that at one time or other, or that in some establishments, the same officer discharged the duties implied under each appellation. For this reason we sometimes find the butler and cup-bearer discharging the duties of the steward, or, at all events, the steward decorated with the appellations of the former.

CHAP.
IX.

Larderer.

6. The Butler, like the steward, received several appellations of different meanings, but each describing one or other of his functions. A cup-bearer is an officer whose pretensions to the highest antiquity may be readily proved on the authority of history, but history begins to record where the philological investigator into the origin and causes of things may discontinue his researches. Cup-bearers were employed before history took notice of them, and etymology assisting history would infallibly place skinker as the oldest title of the butler or cupbearer. Its root, as might be expected, is in Sanskrit. The necessities of life, however, were provided before the conveniences, and the latter took precedence of ornaments. The first chiefs, assisted by their wives and children, brewed their own mead and beer. They could not ferment it without vessels, and the art of sewing skins together is certainly anterior to the production of a barrel. A square formed vat might indeed have been made, before ingenuity had extended to the suture of leather; but such were inconve-

Butler.

* A master-spencer of the larder, and lardeners occur in the household of Henry II. "Magister dispensator lardarii. Lardenarii." There was also a master-spencer of bread.--Hearne, Lib. Nig. Scacc. The names of Larder and Lardner are derivable from these appellations.

CHAP.
IX.

nient for travelling; the first tribes were nomadic; and Don Quixote gives evidence of the use of wineskins or bags in an age when better methods of preserving and transporting liquids were in ordinary use. It must be presumed that the mead or beer was brewed, and had been some time quaffed by the family before a cup was especially devoted to the service of the chief; and if the custody and management of the beer or wine bags (the kind of liquor is of no importance), were entrusted to one person, that officer received a title corresponding in signification to butler. If the skinker and butler were coeval, then inasmuch as the trust of the latter was more weighty, he was the greater in dignity. The circumstances of a wandering tribe reposing in covered wains, or making a temporary heristall, of huts, are greatly in favour of the higher antiquity and superior importance of the butler. Him, therefore, and his synonymes, it will be the duty of a respector of the rights of precedence to consider in the first place.

Pincerna.

In the fourth century, Ulfilas the Goth, made the literary world acquainted with the term pugg, (pron. pung), and applied it to a purse or leathern money bag. St. Jerome, about a century afterwards, mentions the barbarous word pincerna as the common appellation of the chief vintner in his day, and adds that the office of cup bearer was one of the first dignities in the courts of foreign princes.* Pincerna, a butler, and a cupbearer were then one and the same officer. It is contended that this was not always the case. The only part of the word which is not classical Latin is pinc; the termination erna is the Anglo Saxon ærn, ern, Goth. arn, and taking its origin in the Sanskrit verbal root urna, to cover, it runs through the Teutonic dialects, denoting a place of stay or a repository.* In all probability therefore, the word had by some means or other made its way to the Romans from one of the barbarian courts in which there was the officer denoted by the name, which from its relation to the Gothic pugg, a leathern bag for money, appears to be connected with the bags of leather, or skins to hold wine.

* "Ubi nos posuimus principem vinariorum—quem possumus more vulgi vocare pincernam. Nec vile putatur officium, cum apud reges barbarosque hodie maximæ dignitatis sit, regi poculum porrexisset.—In Quæst. in Genes. quoted by Du Cange, who gives two ingenious derivations of pincerna: one from the Greek pinein kirna! by Tanaquill, Faber, in Epist. 76.; and the other, equally good, "Dicitur pincerna quasi penum cernens, i. cellarium, quia semper habet oculos ad vinum suo tempore propinandum.—Joan. de Janua. A more probable derivation would have been à pinace, for the pinax was an eating or drinking table, and -erna is the termination of a class of Latin words. Professor Pott classes it under the Sanskrit root pa, to drink, whence Gr. pinein, &c.

In low Latin, the pincerna is called buticularius, bucellarius, busellarius, and other names of similar formation, all denoting the leather-bag man. From buticularius came butellarius, whence the French bouteiller, which appears to be the original of our butler:—

“ Bedwer the botyler kyng of Normandy
Nom al so in ys half a vayr companye
Of an syurte, verte servy of the botelerye.”†

Buteleria, however, occurs in an ordinance respecting the arrangement of the household of Henry II, where the butler is called a master spencer, which we have seen to have been the appellation of a steward.‡ The reason is obvious: the steward was considered to be the chief officer

* Lat. lucerna, Goth. lukarn, a lant-ern, i. e. a place or covering of lux, linhad, light; taberna, a tavern, i. a covering or shed of tabulæ, thin boards: so pincern is a Gothic word, a covering or bag of leather.

† Robert of Gloucester, p. 191:—

“ Beduer à lautre partie, Servi de la boteillerie.”

Wace, Brut.

‡ “ Magister dispensator butelerie sicut magister dispensator panis et vini. Dispensatores botellarie, qui per vicem serviunt, sicut dispensatores expensæ, qui per vicem serviunt, scil. plus habent candelam, quia habent cereolum, et XXIII frusta candelarum.”—Hearne, Lib. Nig. Scaccarie, p. 349.

CHAP.
IX.

of that department to which he was appointed; and hence the addition of the household, to the chief steward, or equivalent of the early palace count. Bus-ellarius, if it do not originate in the Anglo-Saxon pusa, a purse, is a corruption of buc-ellarius; and buc appears to be the Gothic pugg, without the nasal consonant.* But-icul-arius is the low Latin buticula, a little bag, whence the French bouteille. English bottle, with the personal termination ari common to the Indo-European languages. Butler, therefore is the bottl-er or bottleman, as pinc-erna was the bagman. The origin of this term is the word but (English butt), anciently a bag, but now a large cask: in A.-S. bytta and butta, Ital. botte, Fr. bote and botte, a boot and a wine butt; in barb. Lat. butta; in Gr. bouttis, which Cujus pronounces to be a new word, used by the Tuscans of his time.† Hiero, the mathematician, describes the bouttis as larger at the top than the bottom, which is the form of leather boots for the legs; and the latter were no doubt so called from their resemblance to the wine vessels, or leathern bottles. The Italians name a leathern flask bytta; the Bohemians call a sack pytel; and the German beutel, similarly produced, is a leathern bag or purse. In Ælfric's Monastic Colloquy, the shoemaker mentions among the products of his craft, leathern-hose and bags, bridle-thongs and trappings, flasks

* Boucellus, a leather wine bag, occurring in a charter of the Bishop of Amiens, 1301, is the same word as bucellus. The company of Tanners, it appears, were bound to furnish him with two pairs of leather boucelli, on his preparing to join the king's army. The French bouchelle, Engl. bushel, are to be referred to this word; but Fr. pouche, Engl. pocket, poke, seem to be the Goth. pugg, without the nasal sound:—

“Communitas Tannatorum debet dare domino episcopo, quando debet ire in exercitum domini regis, duo paria boucellorum de corio, quorum una pars teneat unum modium vini, reliquo vero XXIIII. sestiers.”

† Observ. ad Legem Vinaria, c, 26. apud Salmuth. The observation is important, because had the word been ancient, the etymology would be liable to suspicion on account of the agreement of the initial consonant with the Teutonic class.

and vessels of hides.* These bags, utres, are explained in the Anglo-Saxon interlinear gloss, to be "butericas," and the flasks to be "flaxan vel pinnan." Where the Latin has peras, bags, budgets, the gloss has pusan. We are still among leathern boots and bottles. Bute-ricas appears to mean strong bags; pinna is referable to the Gothic pugg, and Latin pinc-erna; flaxa, to the Goth. balgs, a bag; and pusa=phusa, Gr., a pair of bellows (balgs). Pusa is a purse, in the proverb quoted by Lye: "Sa thearfa bæρθ æmtige pusa." The needy man beareth an empty purse. The latter are probably connected with the animal, bos, bous, which furnished the material.

The arms of the family of Bouteillier, in France, are bottles; those of the Butlers, of England, are skinks or cups; and Lat. poculum, a drinking cup, belongs to the class of words denoting vessels of leather; the first syllable is etymologically POC=BAG Engl. and the others are merely grammatical; so that pocillator, a cup-bearer, is still a leathern-bag or bottleman. The English name of Fuller seems more probably to be fulere than the fuller of cloth; and A.-S. ful, a cup, also seems referable to the bull, whose horns furnished the vessel.

The connection between the A.-S. scænc, a cup or pot, Skinker. and scanca, the shank of the leg, is evident; and as cups were anciently formed of shells,† conks, horns and bones, the large shank of some beast may have been the occasion of naming the bearer of it a skinker, skienkare, Icelandic, * Subcaleares and ficones, caligas et utres, frenos et falera, flascones, casidilia, &c.—Cott. MS. Tiberius, A. III, fo. 61 b.

† The following cognates of shank will illustrate this supposition:—

A.-S. scanca,	Frank. scincho,	Swed. & Engl. shank,
sceanca,	Ital. schincha,	Al. schenchum.

Shink, in Scottish, is soup made of cows' hams, the knees and sinews of beef; but in Mearns and other northern counties the skin of beef has this name.—Jamieson, Supplem. Perhaps the Sanskrit sankha, or, as Col. Vans Kennedy has it, in the second case, shankham, a shell, is the original of both shank, the leg, and shenk, a cup.

CHAP.
IX.

skänkare, Sw. scinko, and schenko in Alamannic, all meaning a cup-bearer. Originally wine-skins were simple butts or bags, without any spout, or at most with a clumsy aperture. Convenience taught the wine drawer to insert the shank-bone of an ox into this aperture, and thus he formed a spout. This appears to be the original of the cups of the Butlers, with little knobs on the covers. In other words they were wine bags with shanks, before they became gold cups. From this shank came the verb to shink, or pour out wine, which was unquestionably received into horns. Hence this verb is common in the European languages:

A.-S.	scencan	Dan.	skencke	Dutch	} schencken
Icel.	skienka	Sw.	skänka	Germ.
	skencka	Al.	schenchen	Fr.	eschansonner

“Bacchus win hem skinketh al bouthe;”* and in English he was a skinker:—“But sweet, Ned, to sweeten which name of Ned, I give thee this penniworth of sugar, clapt even now into my hand by an under skinker, one that never spake other English in his life than—Eight and sixpence, and—You are welcome.”†

But before queen Elizabeth’s time, the word imported a cup-bearer in an honorable acceptation. The household of Henry II. had four officers called escantiones, who relieved each other in the time of performing their duties. Adulf, a nobleman in the court of Spain, about 650, with the titles of count and duke, was a skinker companion;‡ and in a French charter of the year 1247, quoted by Du Cange, occurs a ‘Robertus Scantio serviens domini regis:’§ so that it appears to have become a proper name like Bouteillier.

* Chaucer, Marchantes T. 9596. “Eirn herbergis sveirninn skenckti utar a bekiu gestanna.” A boy of the herberge poured out at the bench of the guests.—Norna Gestis S. c. 2.

† Shaksp. 1 Hen. IV. act 2. sc. 4.

‡ His subscription as a witness to the 8th Council of Toledo, runs thus:

“Adulfus, comes scantiarum et dux.”

§ Gloss. t. vi. p. 186.

Byrel, possibly connected with beran, to bear, was the appellation of this officer among the Anglo Saxons and Anglo-Normans.*

CHAP.
IX.

Leodh wæs asungen	The verse was sung,
gleo mannes gyd	the gleeman's song,
gamen eft astah	the joke again arose,
beorhtode benc sweg	the noise from the benches resounded;
byrelas sealdon	the cup-bearers gave
win of wunder fættum.	wine from wondrous vessels.

Beowulf, l. 2312.

But among the Saxons, ladies of the first rank bore the cups to guests of distinction:—

Thæt hio Beowulfe	So that to Beowulf, she,
beag hroden cwen	a queen adorned with rings,
mode gethungen	venerable of mood,
medo ful ætbær.†	the mead-cup bore.

The king's byrelas occur in the Saxon Laws. In the law of Edward the Confessor, on the liberties of noblemen who have their own officers under their frithborg,‡ pincernæ occurring after dapiferi, refers to the butler, and most probably this byrel. There appears in this law an intention to distinguish butler by the term dapifer, and the cup bearer by the term pincerna; so the distinction is marked strongly in the following passage in Hall's Chronicle:—"The erle of Arrondel was chiefe butler, on whom XII citi-

* In Icelandic, Dr. Jamieson remarks, bur is a house of provision, domus pennuarium; byrla, to pour out, has been deduced from biörr, cerevisia.—Gloss. Eddæ.

"On other half was Bedver Thas kinges haeg birle."

Layamon, about 1185.

king Alfred renders the pocillatores of Orosius by byrelas: "Tha geleornodon his byrelas him betweonum hu hy him mihten thæt lif oththringan:" (fo. 54 b.) and thus supports the conjectural etymology from beran, byrel, a cup-bearer.

† L. 1239. See also 1218, &c. In Volsunga Saga, c. 18, queen Borg-hilda destroys her step-son by handing him a horn of poisoned liquor at a feast.

‡ Quoted Suprà, p. 156, n.*

CHAP.
IX.

zens of London did give their attendance at the cupboard. The erle of Derby cupbearer.”* If there were an original difference, we may detect it, by considering the nature of the first wine bags provided with a shank, for decanting the liquor; Arrondel was the skinker who poured the wine into the cup held by Derby; and, as the bags were unwieldy vessels, the former required the assistance of others to hold the belly part while he directed the shank. Such would be the primitive duties of the skinker and cupbearer, officers of vast importance to the chief of a German tribe, who transacted no sort of business without a banquet, in which the item of bread bore the same proportion to the wine as in Falstaff’s tavern bill.

That scænc, and skänk, (pronounced shenk), were also names of the cup, might be because sankha, Sanskrit, was a shell, or because a shank bone was used for a cup.† Before the invention of pottery and the art of moulding metals, shells, horns and hollow bones, as the skulls of animals, were used for culinary and drinking vessels. The Scythians are said to have drunk out of the skulls of their enemies, as in the old story repeated by Hakluyt, of Sua-tislaus, a prince of the Rhuteni:—“At length Stoslaus was slayne by his foe, who, making a drinking cup of his skull, engraved thereupon in golden letters, this sentence: ‘Seeking after other men’s he lost his own.’”‡ A few isolated cases of this kind may be true, but a charge of cannibalism against a whole nation requires other proofs than isolated anecdotes. There has probably been an equivoke in the original term. One of the enigmas in Heidreks Getspekr, turns upon the resemblance of huarinn, anciently a skull, to huarn, a hollow vessel as a pot or cup,§ and indeed,

* Henry 8, the 25 Yere.

† In Persian shank is the proboscis of an elephant.

‡ Treatise of the Duke of Muscovia, v. i. p. 221.

§ ‘Drinhuarn kallar thu nauts skoltin.’—The cow’s skull thou callest its lowing-vessel.—Hervarar Saga, b. 13, g. 23.

etymologically, they are the same word, and correspond with the Latin cranium, Ger. hirn-schale, the brain-shell or pan, A.-Sax. hirn, the brain. But to what word the "Scythian cup" refers we have no evidence. The Lithuanian kubillas, and Lettic kubbuls, a tub, pail or vat, are classed with the Persic khumb, a bowl, by Professor Pott, under the Sanskrit khumba, an urn, a water pot. Under this word he has also Sanskrit kupa, a ditch, a cave, a well, κυπη, a cavern, Lat. cupa, (Germ. kufe,) κυπελλο, Lith. kupka, a cup.* The resemblance of the Sanskrit kupa, to kapala, the skull, (Gr. kephale, and Germ. kopf, the head) may possibly account for the ambiguity in a grammatical point of view; but no doubt, the skulls of beasts, used for containing liquids, have contributed to the foundation of tales of a reproachful character.

As kopf, the skull, may have given us cup-bearer, so Seneschal. shank has produced a synonyme of the butler or steward, very different from skinker. It is the seneschal, in Low Latin Senescallus, and likewise seniscalcus, which Wachter derives from sen, a company, band, or troop, and schalk, a servant, a chief of servants, raised from the same rank. What this "sen, cœtus" is, he does not say, but proceeds to define seniscalcus to be a prefect of the royal household, not a servant, but next to the king. Such also was the cup-bearer or comes scanciarum; and erz schenk, or chief skinker, is an hereditary dignity of the king of Bohemia, who, in virtue of this office, has the honor of presenting the first cup to the emperor at his coronation. Neither Dapifer nor Scantio occurs among the officers of the household of Charlemagne, from whom the dignity was unquestionably derived, or by whom created, but we find that his steward Adulf was styled senescallus,† master or

* Etymologische Forschungen, I. p. 84.

† Carolus per Autulfum senescallum misso exercitu Britones domuit.—Ann. Fuldens., an. 803.

CHAP.
IX.

president of the royal table, and prince of the cooks.* Seneschal, if it were derived as Wachter suggests, would scarcely be chosen by a people for the name of an officer, not one of whose duties are intimated by the compound appellation. The Frankish scinko, scenko, a cup, joined to skalk, a servant, would form a word, not only free from objection, but most correctly describing this Adulf in one of his capacities, that of royal cup-bearer. Scantio, in the Salic Law,† already existed; but it was not a term adapted to popular use like the conjectural scenk-skalk, which would readily become the lower Latin senescalcus, answering precisely to the Swedish skænkswen, cup-swain or servant, a cup-bearer. The office of skinkership of England appears in a Latin genealogy of the House of Lancaster, which states that after the death of Simon de Montfort, the illustrious earl Edmond, son of Henry III., was invested by his father with the counties of Leicester and Derby, and the honor of Hynkeleye “cum Senescalcia Anglie.”‡

Tapster.

Ingenuity and a love of elegance would supersede the original shank as soon as leathern bags gave way to wooden tubs; and a tapp or pipe was inserted: A.-S. tæppe, tæppa, Sw. tapp, tappa; Dutch tap, tappan; Engl. a tap; in French, tapper, to draw off drink: all probably to be referred to the Sanskrit dip, dap, dabh, each of which means to collect, as the tapster does when he catches liquor in a vessel. The liquor was now prevented from running to waste, with a spigot, a wooden nail, in the form of a spike:—

“O base Hungarian wight, wilt thou the spigot wield?”§

This spigot wielder was called a tapster, A.-S. tapper, * “Regiæ mensæ præpositus:”—“Princeps coquorum.”—Continuat. Aimoini, l. iv. c. 78.

† Si quis majorem infestorem, scantionem, mariscalcum, stratorem, fabrum ferrarium, aurificem sive carpentarium, vinitorem, vel porcarium vel ministerialem furaverit aut occiderit—sol. xxxv. culp. jud.—Tit. 11, n. 6.

‡ Harl. MS. Cod. 1808, fo. 21.

§ Shaksp. Merry Wives of W. act 1, sc. 3.

Sw. tappare, Germ. zapfere (?) Dutch tapper. The feminine of the Saxon tapper was tæppistre, which seems to be the immediate progenitor of tapster:—

CHAP.
IX.

Thereto his strength was as a champloun,
And knew well the tavernes in every toun,
And every hostiler, and gay tapstere
Better than a lazar or a beggere.*

Dapi-fer is not a classical word, and may have been invented after tapper had become vulgar, for there seems to be a correspondence in the radicals of the two words. However this may be, the dapifer or good cheer bearer, answers to the description of a skinker (skenkiare) in the Norwegian Court Laws, who was to spread the table with meats and drink, and serve every one according to his rank.†

Dapifer.

According to this account, as well as the signification of dapifer, this officer is intended by the scutellifer, a dish bearer, but literally a skuttle bearer. The term occurs in an ordinance for the household of James II. king of Majorca, and must have been introduced with the office by some Northern adventurers, since it is no other than the skutilsvein of the Norwegians, who was either the skinker in another capacity, or one of his assistants. He ranked next to noblemen who had the right of erecting their own standards; and was styled majordomo or chief of the royal household.‡ This circumstance once more brings us round

Scuttilifer.

* Chaucer, Prol. to C. Tales, 221.

† ‘Er that sidur i flestum landum, at hin hæstum höfðingiar velja almiok menn til thæs starfs, thui at almikit mega their adgöra ag umrauda, at fagurliga komi fram matur og drickur hverium eptir sinum stiet.’—It is the custom in many countries for the highest captains (princes) to desire men of consequence in this office, for much of their duty consists in laying out the table, and properly serving every one with meat and drink according to his rank.—Norrskä Hirdskra, c. 25.

‡ ‘Skutilsveinar eru næstir merkismonnum a nafnbotum og ollum rietti inna hirdar. Thui at their heita Hirdstiorar at rietta med lendum monnum, stallarum og merkismonnum. Their heita og med riettu riddarar.’—Table swains are the next to banner lords in goodness of name (in dignity), and govern all within the court. On this account they are termed palace-

CHAP.
IX.

to the same point, the steward of the burgh and the primitive palace-count. With respect to the word, the Latin scutella, was a hollow dish, but the Norse skutul, is a table, suggesting the formation of the Latin scutellifer, from the resemblance of the two words.

Dish
Thane.

A portator scuteltæ, a dish carrier, was an officer under the bordarius or table man, in the household of Henry II., and Ælfric, in his Glossary, explains dapifer by discthegn, that is table-minister. In the same establishment there were dapifers paid like the chancellor, steward of the bread room, steward of the larder, and stewards of the butlery, a master butler and skinkers; so that in this age and country a large division of labour had taken place, for all these offices seem to have been united in the dapifer and seneschal of the laws of Henry I., and in the major domus and dispensator of the court of Hardecnute. In the establishments of the nobility, the royal style of living was imitated, and hence it was early necessary to enact laws for the regulation of large households, in which a dish thegn ("dapifer"), a byrel or birleman ("pincerna"), a bur thegn ("camerarius," or chamberlain), a cook and a baker were employed.* These constituted the "Domestici" rulers, and they govern barons of fiefs, marshals and banner lords. They are also entitled knights by law.—Ibid. p. 156.

Shuttleworth, a name common in Lancashire, should no doubt be Shuttleward, the keeper of the dishes, for whose office, however, there is no other authority than the existence of the word in a corrupted state.

* See "Descriptio Libertatum."—Suprà. p. 156 n. The apothecary was not then in employment apparently. This was an officer in the palace and establishments of the nobility whose duty appears to have been the preparation of sweetmeats and confections of sugar, and so was a sort of pastry-cook. In the palatine regulations of James II, king of Majorca, (Acta Sanctorum, mense Junii, t. III. p. 28) "Major Camerlengus—species et confectus et fructus ad officium apothecarii pertinentia, quæ extra mensam comederemus, facto gustu nobis ministrare debeat."—And this major or Greater Chamberlain must therefore, have answered to the Dish-thane. The Greek apotheke, is a repository; hence the French called the apothecary un officier, and maitre de l'office.—Du Cange, t. I. col. 573. An officer of the continental nobility, the hirdmen or courtmen of the Saxon baronage, and the housekarls of the Norwegian feudatories. The captains (or vicegerents) of kings and jarls, says the Edda, considering the latter as sovereigns, have followers who are called hirdmen and housekarls. But barons have their henchmen, who in Denmark and Sweden are called hyrdmen (courtiers), and in Norway housekarls, who swear oaths of fealty to them the same as hyrdmen to the king. The housekarls of kings in the ancient Danish language were frequently termed Hirdmen.* It is observed in the collection of Court Laws, that barons ought to have the right, in order to increase their own and the king's power and grandeur, to take to themselves men with the appellation of housekarls.† The chief of these domestics was originally called the palace count, who subsequently became the paltgrave without an annexed territory. Selden compares this last to the "old chief justice of England under the kings of England, who had exercise of supreme jurisdiction for and in the name of the king in all cases that came to the king's immediate audience. For example, one Andobellus was comes palatii in this sense to Clothaire, king of France, about 660, and by virtue of that office sat ad universorum causas audiendas justoque judicio terminandas." The origin of this kind of palace count is found in the nature of the kingly office in ancient times, to rectify grievances and compose controversies. For this purpose, when their sub-was at first a shop-keeper: such are the vicissitudes of titles: it is now one who would consider the explanatory designation degrading to his dignity.

* Thesar kenningar meiga og eiga their hofdingiar, er kongar og jarlar haffa med sier til fylgdar er hirdmann heiter og husskarlar. Enn lendermenn haffa og sier handgeinger menn, tha er i Danmörk og Svydhiod eru hyrdmenn kallader, enn i Norege kusskarlar, og sveria their thö eid svo sem hyrdmenn kongi. Husskarlar konga voru miög hyrdmenn kallader a Danska tungu i forneskiunne.—Edda, by Snorro.

† Lendirmæn skulu hafu vald til at taka sèr menn til traustz en kongi sinni til styrks og semdar med huskarls nafne.—Norrskä Hirdskra.

CHAP.
IX.

jects were comparatively few, and their dominions of no great extent, they held courts at stated times of the year, which were the great festivals of the Pagan as they are now of the Christian religion, and they personally visited the remote parts of their kingdoms.* This customary circuit of the monarch was known in Sweden as the Ericks-gata,† and the vestige of the Saxon practice is discernible in our ambulatory parliaments, and the present circuits of the judges.‡ With increase of power, dominions and subjects, the royal duties became numerous, and the decision of controversies was divided with this household officer. It is useless to inquire after the date of a practice which would be adopted wherever the circumstances of the ruler and the ruled rendered it necessary. In the bailiff, or rather bailli, we have a relic of the king's deputy judge, although none of the functions reside in that officer, except in the Channel Islands, which are governed by the ancient code called the Grand Coustumier, where the Bailli is the chief administrator of civil and criminal justice.§

SKAL is the general form in the Northern languages of the denomination of a cup or goblet: Icel. skal, skaal, Alam. skala, O. Germ. schale, Sw. and Dan. skaal, (pron. shol) besides the Cornish skala, and Gaelic sgala, a bowl.

* ‘Tha kemur ad thui, ad Rerer skal fara i leidgangur, sem sidur er konga ad frida land sitt.’—It came to pass that Rerer went the circuit according to the custom of our kings, in order to settle and compose their country.—Volsunga Saga, c. 4.

† This is an ancient term in the Swedish Laws, and denotes a progress throughout the realm, (æ, whole, rike, kingdom, and gata, a way, road). ‘Nu a kunung eriks gatu ridhæ.’—Now has the king gone the Eriksgata. Upland. Kon. B. c. 2, apud Ihre.

‡ The missus regis of the middle ages was the German gesandt, and the Norse sendiman. The Missi or sent-men were officers despatched from the palace into the provinces with full power to hear and determine causes, to correct abuses, and relieve grievances. There were several kinds, as the fiscal missi, tax gatherers; the missi of dukes and counts, and the missi of judges, who appear to have been a sort of apparitors.

§ Suprà, p. 240, 241.

A shell probably was the earliest drinking vessel, and a shell in A.-S. is sceala, Belg. schael, Germ. schele, Iceland. skael, Sw. and Dan. skal; but the Gothic skaljos was the tiling of a roof, either because shells first served for tiles, or tiles were in the form of shells, or lastly because they formed a shelter; in Sanskrit, shalana, a covering, shalita, covered, shalitra, a coverer, shelterer. Houses themselves in the sense of a covering were called shalas, and at present in Scotland sheilings. The skull may have been so named from its resemblance to the cup, formed of a shell, or in imitation of it; and hence the fables told among the ancients and repeated by the moderns, with the exception of Ihre, that the Gothic nations made drinking cups of human skulls.* Dr. Jamieson, in an interesting article on the Scottish word scoll, a health in drinking, says, "It is highly probable that a cup or bowl received that name from the barbarous custom of drinking out of the skulls of their enemies. Warnefrid says, that 'Albin slew Cunimund, and converted his skull into a drinking vessel, which kind of cup is with us called schala, but in Latin it has the name of patera (l. 1, c. 27).' The same thing is asserted of the Boii (Liv. l. 23, c. 24), and the Scythians by Herodotus (l. 9), of their descendants, the Scordisci (Ruf. Fest. in Breviario), of the Gauls (Diod. Sic. l. 5), and of the Celts by Silius Italicus (l. 14),—

‘ At Celtæ vacui capitis circumdare gaudent,
Ossa, nefas! auro, et mensis ea pocula servant.’

Hence Ragnar Lodbrog, in his death song, consoles himself with this reflection: ‘I shall soon drink beer out from hollow cups made of skulls.’”†

* The equivoque is not confined to the European languages; the Sanskrit sankha is both a trumpet shell and a skull.

† Dr. Jamieson appears to have availed himself of the Latin translation, which is an amplification of the original:

“ Bibemus cerevisiam brevi ex concavis crateribus craniorum.”

CHAP.
IX.

“Not only,” continues Jamieson, “is the meaning of this form (to drink a scoll), as it occurs in other Northern languages, preserved in ours, but the figurative sense is the same. As it has been seen that the Earl of Gowrie ‘drank his scoll to my Lord Duke,’ and that the ‘king’s skole was drunk’ at the bridge of Berwick, we learn from Loccenius that this very phrase is used in the languages of the north, ‘Illud nomen in his Septentrionalibus locis adhuc ita remanet at dricka skala, i. e. bibere pateram metonymice dicatur, quando labitur alicujus honori et memoriæ, quod ex vasculo frequentius fieri suetum, noto vocis indicat.’—(Antiq. Su. Goth. p. 98.) In computations, says Ihre, the name of skaall is given to the memory of the absent, which goes round in the time of drinking, or more fully dricka ens skaall.”

That an individual may here and there have been savage enough to form a human skull into a drinking cup, it would be weak to deny; but that it was a common practice, as reported by the credulous Greeks, he may believe who delights in anilities. The fable has evidently been occasioned by the equivoke in the term for skull and cup; and the testimony of Ragnar Lodbrog, who uses the word hauss, a head, proves nothing, since he refers to his expectations in Valhalla. Even if we could apply the passage to a drinking cup on earth, it would not follow that the hollow hauss was human. To drink a round of skulls in English computation, is to drink to the memories of the departed; and here the skull appears to be not the cup, but the said memories. The word scullion is, however, derived from Scullion.

Lodbrog himself says nothing of cups or skulls:—

“Drekkum bior ad bragdhi ur biugvidhum hausa.”

Str. 25.

Shortly we shall drink beer out of hollowed heads.

Hausskiel, the skull of the head, occurs in this poem.

skull, a drinking vessel, whence it would appear that we formerly used the term in the same sense as the Northern nations.

7. From the establishment of a greve of the palace, inadequately termed comes palatii, as regarded his judicial functions, though it may be correct with reference to his situation about the royal person, resulted a number of other greves, who cannot be considered in the light of comites, with the exception, however, of the landgraff, marckgraff, and burggraff among the Germans. The hærgravius, found by Loccenius in the Chron. Asiat., appears from the composition of the word to have been neither the companion of the general, nor a judge of the army, but the leader or duke himself, at a time when there was little or no difference in dignity between the two titles. According to Selden, Land, in the title Landgraff, denoted a province or territory of somewhat larger extent than that of the feudal graves; and it appears from Schilter, that anciently the landgraff was called landrichter, a provincial judge, and that graff in the title is simply the name of the office. This is, in all probability, the original case of all the officary appellations, and titles of dignity resulting from them, which end in graff, greve, or reve. The landgraff, as the judge and governor of a territory, must have been originally no more than the Saxon scyrgerefa, or shire-reeve, sheriff, for scyr is a province, and gerefa its judicial governor. This office was held by aldormen and earls, both military persons, and hence the sheriff, besides presiding over the shire or county court, had command of the military power within his district. The king's heahgerefa, or highgreve, seems to have been a functionary resembling the chief justice of England, and the judiciary superior of the shire-reeves, who were called heah gerefan, or high reeves, without the addition of king in respect of their precedency over the inferior gerefan of portions of their jurisdictions. Besides the shire-greve, the Laws of Edward the Confessor enumerate greves (for such is the orthography) of wapen-

Graff,
Greve, Gerefa.

CHAP.
IX.

takes, hundreds, burghs, and towns ;* besides whom were Led or Letgreves, Trithingreves, probably Tythinggreves ; and, in the Saxon Chronicle, under the year 897, mention is made of a wicgerefa of Winchester, as an officer of high rank. It matters little that some of these, as the tungreve and burghgreve, came to denote the bailiff or constable of the kind of place or court to which his title of quality is affixed ; for in their origin they must have partaken of the general signification of that title. The ledgreve must have presided over the Court Leet, the most ancient court of record in the kingdom with jurisdiction over all offences except high treason ; the tungreve, though now considered the bailiff of a manor, must in like manner have been the judicial governor of the town, whether it belonged to an earl or the king ; and the burghgreve must have been a similar governor of a burgh or fortified town. The German burggraff is no other than the count of a castle or fort ; and the boroughreeve of Manchester must have derived his appellation from the castle expressed in the name of that town ; while the wicgerefa of Winchester was obviously the governor of the wic or district, otherwise called the city.

Marquis.

8. Nothing can be more clear than that those who had frontiers exposed to hostile aggression, and had the means of defending them, stationed troops upon them for that purpose, allowing them the occupied land as a military feod, the usual stipend before the general use of money. To refer the origin of the marckgraff, translated marquis, to the imperial dukes and counts of boundaries,† is to go

* “Greve autem nomen est potestatis ; apud nos nichil melius videtur esse quam prefectura. Est enim multiplex nomen ; greve enim dicitur de scira, de wapentagiis, de hundredo, de burgis, de villis.” And after an attempt to explain the word by derivation, the writer supposes that the counts of the Frisians and Flemings were called “meregreves,” because they had jurisdiction and government over others.—L. Edw. Conf. c. 32.

† Scythici Limitis Dux ; Rhetici Limitis Dux, &c.—See Selden, p. 299.

to the granary for the first source of wheat. "As the counts or graves of ordinary provinces," says Selden, "were generally called by their province, so such as were employed on the frontiers had the titles of Marchio; and Marckgrave, or Marchese, Italian. Sidonius Appollinaris describes the officary dignity before the name Marquis was known:—

— Comitis sed jure recepto
Danubii ripas et tractam limitis ampli
Circuit, hortatur, disponit, discutit, armat;
In Anthemio.

and he observes that the word marchio does not occur in the empire before Charlemagne, who appointed governors by that name in Gascony.* It is scarcely possible that the office should have subsisted until the middle of the fifth century, when Appollinaris wrote, without a designation. The word mark, as the denomination of a frontier, is of the highest antiquity, and, connected with the title of an officer stationed upon it as a governor, it has been taken for a frontier exposed to hostilities as long as invasion and repulsion have been known. Marchio may not have been coined before the eighth or ninth century, but that word is only the offspring of a Teutonic title. The word mark, which with slight variations in orthography, is found in all the Gothic dialects; marca, Italian; comarca, Spanish, and not disguised in the French marche, English march, Old Scythian marha, is the same as the Persian marz, the limit, border, boundary of a country. By the addition of ban, a lord or warden, which is its signification darban, a gate keeper, it becomes murzabān, a governor on the confines of a hostile country, called marzbum, when named independently of the governor. Now the question is, whether the Gothic nations brought with them this Asiatic

It is Vadiamus, quoted by Wachter, who says that the Franks imitated the Romans, in the creation of this officary dignity.

* Titles, p. 420, 421.

CHAP.
IX.

title, in the form of markbann or merkfan,* like burgban (burj, a castle, and ban), or, as there is reason to believe, from the high rank which the marquis has always held, that he was a companion of the chief, they used gisindo with mark, and thus made it literally a limitis comes. The addition of graff must have taken place after the Germans began to consider it as a title above its import of judge, and equal to count.

Between this Asiatic title ban, and the English banner, or between the Gothic fan, and A.-S. fana, a standard, and also between mark or march, a boundary, and the Icelandic merki, a standard, there is a striking connection; but the application of the terms is different: the banner was the personal ensign of the ban or lord governor, and the merki was the standard of the country original planted on its confines, to distinguish the boundary which surrounded the property of the tribe. We have already ascertained the precise import of ban and its derivative banner, and it is worth while to take the same pains with a word which subsists in all the dialects of Europe and western Asia. At one distant period all this vast tract of land was covered with forests, whose human tenants were little bands of hunters, in Sanskrit called margas, and who, like the North American red men, would very naturally denominate the place of their regular abode a station, Sanskrit sthanam, Lat. statio, Germ. stadt, A.-S. stede, and would find an application for the country around it, from the character in which it was of most importance to them as their hunting ground. Mark, mearc, and march denote a country as well as a boundary. In Sanskrit, maryya is a boundary or limit, and it is manifestly connected with mark, to make go, prepare the way, make a road; margana, a search, marga, a road, morga, a hunter, margika, a deer killer, hunter, a traveller. The modern Persic marz, a boundary, is the same maryya and mark, while the Old Scythian or Thracian marha denoted the standard.

* This Oriental term has been widely circulated. Ban, among the Turks, Hungarians, and other people eastward, is the governor of a territory. From the Sanskrit root BHA, to shine, came bhanu, in Sanskrit, the sun, and banu, in Persian, a prince; the Gothic fan, used in the Gospels of Ulphilas, for lord, gives the A.-S. fana, Germ. fahn and vahn, and English wane, now a weather cock, because it occupies the place of the ancient banner, which is the meaning of the three preceding words. But bhanu, a prince, and bhanu, the sun, that is, the shiner, are also so connected, that, without intending a pun, this may be said to be the most illustrious of titles. There is, however, another root, BHAS, to shine, which also signifies threaten, and hence we see the peculiar force of the barbarous Latin words bannum, an edict, heribannum, a mulct of neglect of military duty, bannire, to issue an edict, publish banns, banniri, to put under bann, to banish, and some others, which are commonly deduced from the old German bann, a lord, without attempting to explain the manner in which bann came to bear that signification. The connection between bhanu, the sun, and the deity, Pan, affords an illustration of Dr. Grimm's law of transition, by which the classical P = Goth. F = Germ. V and B.

The primitive hunters having chosen their stations, would at first adopt natural objects as their landmarks; but where rivers, mountains, remarkable trees and stones were wanting, they would place artificial marks. These might be stakes set on the ascertained line at intervals. In time they would be ornamented and carved with the heads of Gods, and animals sacred to Gods: such were the terminal deities of the Romans; and when Tacitus says that the Germans carry into battle the figures and standards which they have taken out of their groves,* he seems to allude to standards which had been employed in this manner, and which were the marks or military ensigns of all the Germanic nations,† some of whom long retained the Latinized

* Effigies et signa quædam, detracta lucis, in prælium ferunt.—Mor. Ger. c. 45.

† And Sarmatia, where the standard of war in the fourth century was denominated Marha: “Quidam ex illis furore percitus truci, calceo suo in tribunal contorto, ‘Marha, Marha,’ quod est apud eos signum bellicum, exclamavit, eamque secuta incondita multitudo, vexillo elato repente barbarico, ululans ferum, in ipsum principem (scil. Constantium Imper.) ferebatur.”—Amm. Marcell. l. XIX, c. 2.

According to Tacitus the German mark was a boar, and Captain Wilford

CHAP. IX. Sanskrit appellations of Marcomanni and Quadi, as if hunting continued to be their occupation.*

The placing of banners upon fortresses on the borders of a country, and upon the outer walls of castles, is derived from this primitive and necessary use of the hunting standard. He that in early times had the command of the borders or the border fortress, had the mark delivered to him as his warrant of authority, and was called a marchio, marquis, or in Norse, a merkisman. The national standard was peculiarly the standard of the monarch.† It would be delegated to none but a man of the first distinction, and hence it came that men of high rank, though not standard bearers, were styled merkismen.‡ This general title, imported by the Longobards into Italy, was the original of the Marchese, which, and not markgraff, or the Low Lat. marchio, is the original of the French and English Marquis. The Romans, instead of applying the title to mortal uses, devoted it to Marica, the tutelary nymph of the margo, seashore, or forest boundary.

mentions the very curious fact of a tradition of the Hindûs "that Varaheswara [the boar-lord, an epithet of Vishnu, the sun] once reigned in the western countries, where they believe his posterity still live in the shape of white varahas or boars.—Asiat. Researches, vol. III. p. 378. Helmets in the form of boars heads, and armour covered with the shapes of hogs, are common enough in Beowulf; but Tacitus is probably mistaken in saying that the Germans had this form on their ensigns in veneration of the great mother, the animal being every where sacred to the sun. Our word boar is the A.-S. fearh=porc Fr. (from Lat.)=varaha, a boar, Sanskrit; for the A.-S. ea=o long.

* Mark-o-men, hunting-men, hunters: Quadi, (the Sanskrit v or w=Lat. K+V) are Vadhas, hunters. Vadha in Sanskrit, and veiddi in Norse, mean the same, hunting.

† 'Eptir thetta sagdi Heidrekr thionum synum firir ætlan syna, ok lætr tha setia vp merki sitt, ok veitr Haralldhi kongi atgaungo.' Afterwards Heidreck told his ministers his resolution, bidding them to set up his standard, and attack king Harald.—Hervarar Saga, c. 11.

‡ See the extract from the Hirdskra, in a note, p. 271. In the Ynglinga Saga, c. 40, we read that Ingialld Illrædi invited to a great feast, kings, earls, and other merkis-men. See also Olaf's Saga, c. 18, 62, 136.

The merkisman, and consequently the marquis, was what was termed from the other appellation of a standard, a baner-herr or banner-lord, by which was meant a nobleman who had the privilege of raising his own standard, while banersman, in Old Swedish at least, was only a standard bearer. Anciently there was only one banner in an army, unless when taken from the enemy, another was borne as a trophy. When king Harald overcame earl Hakon, he commanded "bædi merkin," the two banners to be carried before him.* So when several kings or princes, who are notably banner-men or lords, were united in war, there might be the standard of each. Of this there was a remarkable instance in the army which queen Margaret led against king Albert, when she had three banners borne before her, for her three kingdoms of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, while Albert was preceded by a still greater number, as having several princes in his forces.† Dr. Jamieson seems to regard the Scottish banerer as the representative of the Swedish term.

That there was very early a distinction between a noble who might and one who might not erect his own standard, may be inferred from the high importance which warlike nations attached to their banner, and which long continued in the German empire, where fiefs of the higher degrees, as principalities, duchies, and graffschafften or counties, were conferred by the presentation of a certain number of ban-

* Heims Kringla, I, p. 147; apud Ihre.

† The words of the smaller Rhyming Chronicle, quoted by Ihre, are—

The Swenske kommo forst a° then bana

Med sa° ma°ngen ærlingen fana

Af thesse try rike baner,

Æn hade the Tyske ma°nge fler

Af hertuga, grefwe och banerherra.

The Swedes came first in the array

With so many noble flags

Of these three realms the banners;

But yet the Germans had many more,

Belonging to dukes, to counts, and bannerlords.

CHAP.
IX.

ners.* The origin of this custom is no doubt to be traced to the use of the standard in determining the property on which it was erected, and giving to the officer in charge of its defence, a title derived from its own appellation of mark. When the duchy of Bavaria was surrendered into the hands of Frederick Barbarossa, in 1156, in order to the advancement of the marquisate of Austria to a duchy, the surrender of it was made by the delivery of seven banners, and the creation of the duchy by the presentation of two. The investiture of the duchy of Bavaria in the duke of Saxony, was made by the same seven banners, each denoting, originally, a place won by battle.† The poet Gunther, in reference to this emperor's giving a kingdom to one brother and a duchy to another, mentions the delivery of a banner on occasions of investiture as an ancient ceremony:—

“Ergo ubi vexillo partem, quam diximus ille,
Hoc autem gladio regnum suscepit ab ipso;
Hunc etenim longo servatum tempore morem
Curia nostra tenet.”

The act of delivering the banner appears to convert the fief into a sovereign jurisdiction. The territory so honoured was called a fahnlehn, or banner-feod, which appears as Vanlehn in the Golden Bull of the emperor Charles IV. in 1356. If the prince invested by the emperor with a fief of this value, were a bishop, the presentation was made with the imperial sceptre, which he was required to touch, and the fief was then called a Zepterlehn.‡ This ceremony, which superseded the ancient mode by ring and pastoral

* Imperator confert cum sceptro spiritualibus, et cum vexillis secularibus, feuda omnia illustriæ dignitatis.—Spec. Saxon. l. III. n. 30.

† The Chron. Picturatum says absolutely a grand engagement was denoted by the banner, and if so, it explains the custom and term of striking the flag. “Hertog Wilhelms to Brunswick seven Banren van seven hövet Strieden, &c.”—Script. Brunsvicens. t. II, p. 419.

‡ ‘Der kaiser sol lihen allen gastlicken Fursten in reht mit dem Zepter, und allen weltlichen Fursten mit dem Vanen.’—The emperor is to invest all spiritual princes in their right with the sceptre, and all temporal princes staff, was not always quickly dispatched; for at the investiture of the archbishop of Metz, no fewer than fifty banners were presented to him. The number, however, is only a proof of the tendency, in ceremonial matters, to run into excess, for originally a single banner was a sufficient representative of the country delivered. This appears from the custom that when a prince, who was present at an investiture, had pretensions to the fief about to be conveyed, he signified his claim by touching its banner. An instance of the latter occurred in 1530, at the investiture of the dukes of Pomerania, to which the elector of Brandenburg laid claim.*

The banner, called by the Germans fahn and van, or vahn, was manifestly named from ban, a lord, and is found in the Anglo-Saxon compound gudhfana,† the gundfahn of the Germans, and guntfano of the Italians, all signifying the same thing, a war banner, the n being an addition in all but the Anglo-Saxon. From a passage in the Roman de Rous, it appears that the gonfanon was attributed to barons, and the penon to knights:—

“Li barons ourent gonfanons, Li chevaliers ourent penons.”

According to other passages quoted by Du Cange, the gonfanon was a flag suspended at the end of a spear or lance:—

with the banner.—Jus. Provinc. Aleman. c. 116. One passage in these notes appears to be a translation of the other; both have been transcribed from writers on the subject.

* Selden, Titles of Honor, p. 338-341.

† From the Sanskrit root YUDH, to fight. The whole A.-Sax. word seems to be Oriental. Dr. Bosworth, in attempting to derive the A.-Sax. adjective, god, good, from gudh, war, observes that the latter is a “contraction of ge and udhr, rage, fury in battle, Odin.” In this etymology there are more errors than can be conveniently noticed. Odin is not derived from any Icelandic word, nor can udhr be taken as the parent of an Anglo-Saxon word. Udhr, rage, fury, may be related to gudh, through the root YUDH.

CHAP.
IX.

"Baisse la lance où li gonfanon pent."

Roman d'Aubery.

"A lances sont li gonfanons pendus."

Ibid.

Apparently the difference between the penon and the gonfanon was that while the latter was square, the former had wings, tails, or pinions, which were cut off when the knight was made a banneret, or the bearer of a smaller kind of banner. But though both were war banners, the persons privileged to use them were not of the rank of baner herren or merkis menn.*

Lords Marches.

9. The old English Lords Marches are truly markgraffs and marquisses, with a vernacular appellation. Their power upon the borders of Wales and Scotland was not to be exceeded by that of the greatest count palatine instituted by William the First, for the very same purpose of defending his dominions against incursions. The Welsh Marches are supposed to have been settled by the Saxons as a barrier against the Britons. The lords marches appear to have been earls, and held their courts severally in their jurisdiction, until Henry III. fixed a court at Ludlow; which, says the compiler of "Documents connected with the History of Ludlow," was continued till William III., after the death of the earl of Macclesfield, thought fit to divide the government between two peers of the realm, with titles of lord lieutenant of North and South Wales, and dissolved the court, which used to consist of a president, as many counsellors as the prince pleased, a secretary, an attorney,

* The banderia, the standard of the middle ages, appears to have been formed from the Longobardic band-um of the same signification (Paul Warnefrid, l. I, c. 20), which is not as Du Cange supposes, the Persian band, fascia, a band or ligature, but the Gothic bandwo, a sign. Bandi, Gothic, corresponds with the Persian; and bandwo with the Arabic band, a large standard, a legion or army of ten thousand men. From the Gothic verb bandurjan it seems probable, however, that the band, fascia, is the primary meaning, then, a number of men banded together, then, the name of their standard, and lastly any sign or token. These terms are connected with the Sanskrit bandh, to bind, unite; bandhata, a band of kinsmen.

a solicitor, and four justices of the counties of Wales. In their respective courts, the Lords Marches had power of life and death; "and in every frontier manor a gallows was erected, and if any Welshmen came over the boundary between them and the English (then Saxons), they were taken up and hanged; every town within such Marches being furnished with a horseman, armed with sword and spear, maintained on purpose to take them up: and if any Englishman was caught on the Welsh side, he suffered the same fate, such was their antipathy to each other; for the Welshmen counted all lawful prizes they took from the English. For this reason houses were frequently moated round, and palisadoes or stakes set round the edge of the moat to make a stronger fence, into which place the inhabitants every night drove their cattle for better security. If a Welshman could get a stolen horse or cow over the bar, he cried out 'My own!' and further the horseman dared not follow, or they would have hanged him." Their authority was abolished by a statute of Henry VIII., in which they appear to have been incorrectly styled Lords Marchers.*

10. The Spanish senhor, French seigneur, and Italian senior, are unquestionably words of the same origin and import, but that any of them is even remotely connected with the Latin senior, an old man, is very doubtful.† It may

Senior,
Senhor, Seigneur.

* So spelled by Blackstone, who cites the statute.—Comm. I, 397. March-er, a man of the march, is not incompatible with lord; but the meaning of the title is not a lord marcher, but a lord of the march, as in the Persian title murzaban, and the German markgraff.

† Menage seems to have given currency to this false derivation, which however, is very ancient (See p. 32, n.). Speaking of the title sire, he says that it "undoubtedly comes from the Latin ablative seniore, because people advanced in years have at all times borne the first dignities, witness the word πρεσβυτης, among the Greeks, and senatores among the Romans. The writers of Low Latin used senior and seigneur for a lord. Cujus, in the preface to his book on Fiefs, says that vasallus is represented by dominus, which is also called senior, though the man might not be advanced in years, in the same way that we say senator and presbyter, rather out of custom,

CHAP.
IX.

be considered as an established fact, that under the feudal system, every nation had its banner lords, or persons privileged to bring their tenants into the field, under their own respective standards. In old Spanish senna, or senha, and also senheria, signified a sign, token, standard, whence senhoria, a lordship,* and senhor, a baron; now what are these but words formed upon the Latin signum, whence insigne, a military standard? The Italian, which rejects aspirates, and as much as possible the nasal sound, is indeed spelled in the same manner as the Latin, but the signification of its senior is that of the Spanish senhor, represented in old English as signior, as well as the old French seigneur. And in middle age Latin, senior was not the adjective, but a modification of the nasal appellation. With this explanation it is not difficult to understand why the title of seigneur was attributed to the Carlovingian princes, who were elected "seniors" before they were called by the voice of the people to the throne.†

Signum is very commonly derived from the Greek sema, a sign, standard,‡ but both are Sanskrit in origin, and very different words. Sima, a limit, boundary, border, furnishes the Greek, and very likely the Latin limes, but not signum, which is sanjna, signs, symbols, characters, terms. Hence insigne, a standard, primarily refers to the characters than in regard to age." "From senior we have made seigneur, whence the Italians have made signore, and the Spaniards sen'or. From sio, a contraction of seniore, we have made sieur. Of sio, the Italians have made sire, of which we have made sire." This is sad blundering. The Longobards took sire into Italy; the Burgundians and Franks took it into France. With respect to the Greek presbuteros, senior, on which many rely for support in the explanation of senator, as the dignity of an aged person (Hoffmanni Lexic. Univers. t. IV, in voc.), it appears to have become a title by using a sibillant in place of the aspirate bha, in the Sanskrit prabhuh, a lord (Suprà, p. 209).

* Senhoria occurs in the sense of senheria in a charter of the date 1293. "Tenere possint si voluerint vexillum seu senhoriam per tres dies naturales in signum majoris domini."—Du Cange, t. IV, c. 376.

† Annales Fuldenses, An. 887, &c.

‡ Encyclop. Britannica (New Edit.), art. Philology, p. 392.

and marks, the devices formed either with the staff, or upon the flag or pendant, which it might carry. The insigne of the Romans was properly the eagle itself.

CHAP.
IX.

11. There are two appellations of officers of very high rank, both in the royal household and in the state, the Constable and Marshal, in the former of which alone the title of count appears; but there is no doubt that very early, though perhaps not originally, the marshal was also a companion. Both terms are connected with the stable and its brute inmates. From the etymology of constable, comes stabuli, companion of the horse stall or stable, we learn little more than that the office was filled by a person in the household of a sovereign. It is perfectly clear that constable, which Wachter believes the Franks to have used when they instituted the office, could not be the term employed by any German people before the great irruptions into the Roman provinces; and it is equally evident that a warrior chieftain had a number of horses, animals to which these people were, as their descendants continue, particularly partial, he would have grooms, and those grooms would be under separate government. If a Roman emperor had a master of horse, and if Charlemagne found it necessary or ornamental to have a constable, then under some other name, the predatory chieftains of the north, induced by like pride, or more probable necessity, placed their horse-stalls under similar management. Though the precise word, by which such an officer was denoted, may not be detected, there are abundance of terms, and some customs, that smell strongly of the primitive stable.

*Constable
and Marshal.*

12. It has been sufficiently seen that the appellations given to officers among all the Teutonic or Gothic race, were significant of their duties, or in some way or other connected with them by very sensible ideas. Paul Warnefrid has preserved the designation of the Longobardic curator of horses, and it literally signifies the horse-boy, as does the hestasvein in the ancient herberg or palace of the Scandinavian monarchs. The appellation referred to is Marshal.

CHAP.
IX.

marpahis, from mar, the general Teutonic appellation of horse, and particularly of a war horse, the reason of which is probably found in the Sanskrit root MAR, to sound, in reference either to its voice, or the sounding of its hoofs. The other part of the compound is an Oriental word from which the Greek pais, Turk. peck, Sw. poike, and our boy, the Italian paggio, and the French and English page, have originated. This word in the Persian is bach, a child, a boy, a youth, a servant, which in the plural, bachagān, denotes also the young of any animal, and is connected with the verb bachakāndan, to drop, distil. Boxhornius notices that bagoes was the appellation of the attendant on a king in Persia and Macedonia; but it is unquestionably the same word. All these words must be referred to the Sanskrit bhaga. Marpahis is, therefore, horse-boy and horse-page; but the officer denoted by this appellation was a person of note. Gisulf, the nephew of Albino, was his horse-page before he was appointed by that monarch to the government of Friuli, which soon afterwards became an independent duchy;* and a horse-page is represented as accompanying king Cunibert into the Senate.† Warnefrid translates the word strator, the strewer of the litter, and this may have been originally the duty of the page, but certainly it could not have been discharged by the person just mentioned.

Page.

In Scandinavia, the horse-page was denominated similarly in signification, hestasvein, horse-swain, youth or servant, and from passages in the ancient Sagas, appears to have been a person of high rank about the herberg or palace.‡ Attendants of this kind are called adelschalks,

* Alboin Gisulfum, ut fertur, suum nepotem, virum per omnia idoneum, qui eidem strator erat, quem lingua propria marpahis appellant, Forojulianæ civitati, et toti regioni illius præficere statuit.—P. Warnefr., de Reb. Longob. l. II, c. 9.

† Ib. l. VI, c. 6.

‡ ‘Annad sinn kemur Reiginn ad mæla vid Sigurd, og mælti, kinlegt er thad ad thu villt giorast hestasvein kongs, edur fara hlauprar.’ On another noble servants, in a decree of Tassilo, duke of Bavaria, for the regulation of their weregild, which he directs to be estimated as if they were at home with their parents, but the weregilds of others were to be taken according to the law of weregilds.*

The Germans call their attendants on princes edel knaben, noble boys, i. e. pages. As to the word page, which appears to have come to us through the French, as its cognate and synonyme, boy, from the Swedish, Dr. Richardson quotes the following passage from Horne Tooke:—"As servants were contumaciously called harlot, varlet, valet, knave, so they were called pack, patch, page." Meaning that page comes by vulgar use from pack, through patch, he produces the two instances below to show that the office was not originally an honour, and derives the word from "A.-S. pæcan, to pack, and consequently to impose upon."† But Warnefrid's authority sets the original force of the word beyond doubt. The mar-page was a military man of the first importance; and in the old French Romances, the term page is still military; and is applied to an attendant on a knight, but not to an esquire,‡ for in all probability it denoted a youth (the Persian bach). In France, however, occasion comes Regin to talk with prince Sigurd, and said to him, 'Is it (more) natural that you should become king's horse-page, or go about like runners?' (be at liberty.)—Volsunga Saga, c. 22.

* "Servi principis, qui dicuntur adelschalke, suum habeant weregeldum, juxta morem, quem habuerunt sub parentibus et ceteri minores weregeldi juxta legem suam."—Apud Ihre.

† "Our lyege lorde the Kyng hath power and freedom of a page for to make a yoman."—Dives & Pauper, 1st Comm. c. 17.

"I had rather be torne with wild horses then any varlet should have wonne such lots, or any pages or pricker should have had the price (prize) of me."—Hist. of Kinge Arthur, c. 97.

‡ Du Cange illustrates this application of the word from Will. Guiart, anno 1301:—

"Metent à mort es herberjages Chevaliers, escuyers, et pages."

And the Chronicle of Bertrand de Guescelin:—

"Son bacinet faisoit à son page porter."

CHAP.
IX.

as in England, it was at an early period bestowed only on persons of a low condition; and in the former, the assistants of tilers were called their pages.* The diminutive of page, Paget, which is the surname of a noble family, occurs in one of our Monkish Chronicles.†

Gower employs the term Horse-Knave,‡ as if it had fallen into contempt even in his time :—

And everie hour this freshe Maie
These lustie lads ride aboute,
And I must nedes sew (follow) her route,
In this maner as you now se,
And trusse her halters forth with mee
And am but her horse knave.

Confessio Amantis.

Ammianus Marcellinus applies the word strator, to the person who took care of the imperial horses, who could only have been so called originally from strewing the litter. In the Salic Law the strator is placed between the mariscalcus, marshal, and the smith or farrier, so that he was probably under the direction of the marshal, whose title resembles that of the mar-page, and means a horse-servant. In the Alamannic Law, if a marshal, having the care of twelve horses, were slain, the weregild was forty shillings, which was the amount of the composition for the death of a seneschall over twelve servants, and a swine-herd over forty hogs.§ This implies a much lower rank than held by the Longobardic and Norse horse-page. Spelman remarks a difference between the marshal and constable in the

* In the Salic Law even a king's boy or page is classed with a person of low rank. "Si quis puer regis vel lidus, &c."—Tit. xiv. n. 6.

† "Anglici perdiderunt nisi duos sagittarios et unum pagettum."—Henr. Knyghton, An. 1342.

‡ Wachter says that knab implied a youth, a belted soldier; and with adel, a page. In older German it was knaph = gnav-us Latin. The word horse appears to denote the neigher, as mar does the sounder, from the noise of its hoofs. Our horse is the A.-S. hors, Germ. hross and ross; and resh and hresh are both Sanskrit roots denoting to neigh.

§ Tit. 79, n. 4.

time of Charlemagne, equal to that between master and servant: there were several marshals, and but one constable. He was appointed by the prince, and they received their office from the constable. After the Carolingian race of kings, the constable does not appear to have rejected the appellation of marshal; and thus it has happened that the latter has been attributed to the commander of the royal army instead of constable. By a like confusion of terms, strator was afterwards substituted for marshal, in the case of Robert de Montfort, the hereditary marshal of the Norman army.

That marshal was originally an appellation of no great repute, is evident from several circumstances, besides the disparaging classification in the Alamannic Laws. Of these the principal fact is, that the word is used to denote very low offices, as well as the high one of Earl Marshal. Mere farriers are called mareschaux, in France; and Matthew Paris, an. 1252, uses the word marischalcia, as the place for putting up horses. Madox cites a record of the reign of Edward II., by which it appears that Thomas de Warblynton held the manor of Shirefield in chief of the king by the service of being mareschall of the whores in the king's household, of dismembering condemned malefactors, and of measuring the galons and bushels in the king's household.*

In Germany, the duke of Saxony, as arch-marshal of Avenor. the empire, discharged the humble duties of hostler; in Low Latin, abatis, and French avenor. The Golden Bull of Charles IV. directs that the duke shall attend on horseback in the yard of the palace in which the emperor resides, and with a silver staff in his hand, and a silver measure, each of the weight of twelve marks of silver, supervise the measurement of oats for the imperial stables. As soon as they are heaped up as high as the breast of his horse,

* Lyttleton, Henry II., t. IV, p. 50. Was he a carnifex and henchman?
—See p. 250.

CHAP.
IX.Hostler.

he shall take a measure of oats, and deliver it to his vice-marshal (of Papenheim), or to the marshal of the palace, who serves the horses.* Feeding the horses was, therefore, another original duty of the marshal. The Germans, however, call the avenor or hostler a marstaller, and our equerry seems to be no other than the hostler and oat-measurer.

Among the Anglo-Saxons there was a king's horse-thegn, horse-minister, who was a person of high rank,† and who, since Ælfric renders prebenda avenæ by fætfillere, the measure filler, could not have been an avenor or oat-server. He may very truly, according to the import of the words, have been what is now termed master of horse, for master of horse servants, and so have been the equal of the imperial constable. Selden translates the title hors-thegn, in Latin, strator, and in English, master of the horse. In old Swedish the commander of cavalry was called marsch, which Ihre considers to be a contraction of marshalk, a marshal. As elsewhere it came to be a high dignity, and borne by persons of royal birth. When king Karl conferred the office upon Canute, who succeeded to the throne, he gave him a white staff, as is mentioned with much minuteness in the Rhyming Chronicle:—

Konungsen fick honom en hwitan kepp
Och Marskens embeti thermed.

The king gave to him the white staff,
And Marshal's office therewith.

Farrier.

Four marshals of the household of Henry II., whose wages were increased when they made herbergerie on the king's business, may possibly have been the original of the "king's Harbingers," in the old ballads of Robin Hood. The Farrier, taking his name from ferrum, iron, was no other than the horse-shoer, whom the French and Dutch call a marshale; and ferrura is explained in a charter of

* Aurea Bulla, c. 27.

† Chron. an. 897.

Henry V. to be the office of shoeing horses.* From this office, of which the duties were probably at first performed by the occupant, the noble family of Ferrers derived its name.

13. Among the palatine officers of the empire was a Treasurer. comes thesaurariorum, or treasure companion, i. e. a treasurer. No Teutonic word preserves this appellation in connection with the attributive of dignity comes; yet no people had more occasion for store keepers than the northern freebooters, who, themselves perpetually engaged in predatory warfare, were exposed to the same evils which they inflicted on others. The trust reposed in such a person, necessarily implies intimate contiguity to the chieftain, and therefore little need arises to suppose the office to have been borrowed from any similar institution in either the old or the lower empire. In Anglo-Saxon, the treasurer was the hordere, whence our hoarder, one who has a hord, hoard or treasure; and in old Norse, he was called a fiehirder, which literally denotes a cattle-herdsman,† and in a secondary sense a treasurer. The employment of this last term in connection with cattle, takes us back into the pastoral age before the use of money, and we are led to observe the sameness of the change which took place in the Gothic and Latin terms for cattle in a collective sense. The F in the Gothic faih-us, Norse fieh, A.-S. feoh, cattle, became V in the Old Germ. vihu, N. Ger. vieh, and P in the Lettic and Old Prussian pecku, and Latin pec-us, cattle; the H of the former also becoming the K of the two latter.

* Scias quod assignavimus te ad tot ferra et clavos equorum, quot pro equis stabuli nostri, in præsentī viagio nostro, ferrandis necessaria fuerunt, ac fabros et ferrum, et omnia alia quæ officia ferruræ necessaria fuerint sui quamdolibet opportuna.—Rymer, Fœd. t. ix, p. 250.

† ‘Hann fann eirn mann er hiord hiehl—tha tok fiehirdarinn hrædast.’ He found a man who was grazing cattle—then the herdsman took fright.—Hervarar Saga, c. 7. ‘Rændu oc brændu thar bygd alla, enn drapa menn oc fie, oc alt thad quikt var.’ They plundered and burned all the towns there, slaying man and beast, and everything that was living.—Ibid. c. 10.

CHAP.
IX.

It matters little which language is considered the elder; for this very agreement, by conversion, proves only a common origin, the Sanskrit paçu, a beast. Mr. Wining, in his essay on the origin of the Sabines, has all but proved them to have been Prussians and Courlanders.* The Gothic faihus does not occur in the sense of cattle; but the other words do commonly enough, as well as in that of money, whence our term fee, for pecuniary reward or offering. When king Alfred translated Orosius, the meaning seems to have been in a state of transition; for he uses the phrase licgende feoh, lying fee, for still property, as money, treasures, and furniture, magnum auri pondus,† and so on; and gangende feoh, walking fee, and cwic feoh, quick or live stock, for cattle generally. The Latin pecunia, money, is a recent formation from pecu-s or pecku, the cognate of feoh or feh, by the addition of the nasal termination. With respect to hord, and hordere, it may be observed, that in Gothic, haird-a is a herd, and haird-eis, the herdsman, which takes as its equivalent heord, a herd in A.-Sax. (air=eor), and therefore this word is not connected with cattle. On the other hand, the Gothic haurd, a door or gate (au=ō), gives the A.-Saxon hord, and hordere, a treasurer, must in the first place have denoted a door-keeper, the darban or door-lord of the Asiatics; while hord, a treasure, is simply that which is kept shut up. The Latin thesaurus, a treasure, is so evidently connected with the Sanskrit root dhā, to keep, preserve, and sris, fortune, that an expectation of finding a like word under the canon of transition, would not be unreasonable though ungratified. Ælfric explains it in his Glossary, by

* Manual of Compar. Philology, P. III, c. 4, p. 264 ff.

† Oros. Cott. MS. Tiber. B. I, fo. 31 b, 50, 51. Pecunia, perhaps by mistake, is used for pecudes in the Alamannic Laws (tit. 74), and this very Saxon expression, "pecunia viva," (cwic feoh), occurs in the Laws of Edw. Confessor, c. 10, and Will. I, c. 9.

feh gerefa, which etymologically denotes rather a collector of money than a purse-bearer, its signification.

CHAP.
IX.

14. The English title, Commodore, given to a naval officer, is to be referred to the class of companions, notwithstanding the assertion in the etymological dictionaries, that it is derived from the Spanish, and signifies a commander. A commodore is not, etymologically, a commander, but a companion of a commander, namely, an admiral, while the title of commander is otherwise appropriated in the department of military service.

Commodore.

Comdorii, in the military and feudal ranks of the 13th century, occupied the station between viscounts and vavasors among the people of Chalons, Gevaudan and Arcyron. The name is obviously the Latin comitores, which, as the frequentative form of comites, requires no remark. This title occurs in the will of James of Arragon, printed by D'Achery (t. ix, p. 200), and cited by Du Cange: "Et cum comitibus, vicecomitibus, comdoriis, vasvessoribus et aliis militibus civibus, &c." Why such a term should have been selected for the English sailor is not very clear. In the Salic Law (tit. 2), we find a military leader styled ducarius, of which the reason was probably that dux was already appropriated to the highest rank, and that this was to denote the next in command. In the imperial court, under Constantine, sea officers called ameralii (ameralioi), or admirals, occur in precedence of drungarii and comites. We know that consul was often used for comes or earl of a shire by the English writers of Latin in the middle ages; and before the Eastern word admiral was adopted for the commander of a fleet, consul is mentioned as corresponding with the oriental appellation, by Matt. Paris, in 1272.* A few years afterwards, William de Leyburne, by patent Ducarius.

* Gloss. t. II, p. 789. Spelman considers this to be the first occurrence of the word in English history; but Robert of Gloucester, who wrote a few years before this date, uses it. Speaking of a defeat sustained by the Saracens, he says:

CHAP.
IX.

dated 15 Edw. I., 1286, was constituted "Admirallus Maris Regis." But when Matthew Paris wrote, the title was captain and warden of the sea—"Capitaneus et custos maris," in the charter of Thomas de Middleton, dated 3rd Jan., 48 Henry III., or 1264. It may have been that this captain and warden was considered a sort of consul, and so was a comes by courtesy, and that, on the introduction of the new title, the next in rank was styled his commodore, or lower companion in command, for that is the sense of comdorius and comitor.

Admiral. In Arabic, says Spelman, amirom is a leader, and with the article, al-amiro, a chief captain. Mention of four prætors of the Saracens, called amaræi, occurs in Sigebert's Chronicle, in the year 630. Our Milton prefers this orthography, in applying the term to a ship:—

His spear, to equal which the largest pine Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great ammiral, were but a wand.

Parad. L. I, 294.

Vavassor. According to the classification of James of Arragon, the commodore should be the next inferior to the viscount, which with ourselves and others is a baron, considered as an individual or special title, and vavassor or valvassor, a gentleman who holds his fee of a baron. Some feudists, says Spelman, derive the word from vasallum; and others, more probably from valvis, "quasi ad valvas stantes," because they waited at their lords gates on festivals when the people came to pay their respects. Spelman suggests the A.-S. wal, (weall) a wall, as if they were valvasores, constituting a rampart of defence, and repelling enemies from

" ——— Tuelf princes ther were ded,
That me clupeth amyrayls — "

L. 402.

and again, p. 407:—

" An amyrayl there bysyde, that an castel waste, Geld hym up to Cristine me though he nuste warto truste."

the gates and entrances of the realm.* These etymologies are very erroneous, but not more objectionable than many others of the same age. What one would expect to find in the term is a reference to the chief characteristic of the valvasor, holding his fee of a baron, the vassal of a vassal, or the vassal of a chieftain; and if we followed the example of seeking words to suit a particular meaning, it would be exceedingly easy with such words as wald, power, wealda, a chief, and vassal, to produce the term wanted. Valvasor is not a compound; but since it is isolated in Low Latin, nothing can be learned from its French and English derivatives. The Spanish orthography, vasvessor, in the will above quoted, which has occasioned the notice of the term where it has no just claim, is the same as the vasvasour, Engl. vavasor. The proper orthography is valvasor, whence valvas-in-us, the diminutive, both implying a servant, and derived from the Sanskrit varivas, service. The lingual r in this language, when it is not retained in the corresponding Persian, Greek, Latin, Lithuanian, Gothic, A.-Saxon, and O. High German, always becomes an l, and thus valivas, contracted valvas=varivas, and with the ordinary terminations or and in, valvasor, valvasin. The valvasor appears to have been the servant of the chief tenant of the sovereign, and to have been paid in the same manner as his superior, i. e. with a portion of that superior's feod or fief.

* Gloss. p. 549.

CHAPTER X.

Titles from personal accidents and attributes.

- 1.—BARON. 2.—Man, 3.—a vassal. 4.—Barones, farones, varones. 5.—Vir. 6.—Richmen or barons. 7.—Highmen, nobility. 8.—Goodmen, fighters, knights. 9.—Boni homines, prodes hommes. 10.—Laird. 11.—hersir. 12.—frey herr. 13.—barne. 14.—beorn. 15.—sire, siresse. 16.—sennorio. 17.—Knight. 18.—child, baba, infanta; dans, donzello. 19.—Bachelor, chevalerie. 20.—haigstalders, haistaldi. 21.—Esquire. 22.—shieldbearer, sergeants. 23.—Gentlemen. 24.—Vavasor, vicedomini, vidame; franklin. 25.—Commoner.

CHAP.
X.Baron.

1. It has been seen that the barbarians, preferring their own forensic terms to those which were familiar to the Romans, employed baro and barus, instead of vir or homo, when they intended man in a peculiar sense. The reason of this preference of vernacular to foreign words is easily understood, but it is not equally evident why they did not Latinize man in the same manner instead of bar. Whatever that reason was, it has operated upon the two terms so effectively, that while one continues to denote the human species, the other has become a title of honor.

Man.

2. There is a radical affinity between bar and vir, and between man and homo (ho-min-is), which they did not perceive, though a discrimination was made when homo was taken to represent man considered as a vassal. The former is only the latter augmented by the Sanskrit su, well, good, which, according to Mr. Wining, became FU, whence the transition to HU, HO is an occurrence sufficiently common.* Man in Persian, is this Gothic man, on which

* This etymology seems to have been formed to suit his Sabine theory, but it is not objectionable, although not very necessary, since nothing is the Foreign Quarterly Reviewer of Jäkel observes "We consider the word man as in some degree a crux etymologorum, and the Professor has not solved the difficulty. Two suppositions have been made out; first that the root of ho-min is in the second syllable; secondly, that it is in the first hom. No doubt the root m-n is found in almost all the languages. It occurs in many Sanskrit words, and seems always to mean the divided, reasoning creature, &c. In this sense the very word *man-aw-a is found. Hence the names Menu, Menes, Minos and the like, denoting law-givers; hence also mens, μνη the moon, with many other words the scholar may class for himself, and hence also the A.-Saxon and English man." That the simple meaning of man is the conscious or knowing animal, is clear from the Sanskrit mān, to know, mind, understand, whence man-uh, a wise and learned man. But Menu and other names belong to the root, mān, to judge, honor; and possibly both roots are deduced from mnā, to learn by heart, study, that is observe and remember, in which knowledge consists.

3. Man having this signification, is radically irrespective of sex, and so it is found in all the languages. It was taken to mean a vassal, because military service in person might be commuted, and in the case of a female tenant, either dispensed with or performed by proxy.

4. A brave man or hero in primitive times was a strong man. The Ajax (Aias, Gr.) of ancient fable, the bravest and strongest of the besiegers of Troy, was a poetical personification of the quality implied in his name,—the Sans-more common in language, whether antient or modern, than the interchange of the sibillant with the aspirate. The digamma seems to result from a defective aspiration in fumo for homo. If the A.-S. guma be the same word, there is a stronger departure from the Sanskrit su.

* Manava is the offspring of Manu, a man, which is also a proper name, the Mannus or Mann of the Germans, in Tacitus, and Manavina is man-(v)ing, relating to man or Mannus, and like the English surname Manning.

CHAP.
X.

krit aujas, strength.* The Romans, Goths, Germans, and Scandinavians, when they intended to express a man as distinct from woman, employed the same word varied in each language according to the ascertained law, and that word is a derivative of the Sanskrit root vira, strength, power, whence vira, a hero, and var-man, armour, in the same ancient language. A different etymon is assigned by Sanskrit grammarians, who class vira with a number of words which are said to be deduced from their alleged roots by the addition of the letter repha, and in this vague manner they derive vira from aj, go. Varman, armour, where man is only the common grammatical termination, is manifestly referable to the same vira, as implying a strong covering of defence, or a strong weapon. The reason that a strong man and a brave man were considered the same, is obvious. The strong man could not only bear the weight of armour, which the foe by no effort could penetrate; but he could wield weapons which no armour worn by inferior men, could resist. Such a man was therefore able to overcome a multitude of the enemy, and so was deemed a hero, a word also connected with the Sanskrit vira. On this consideration, it appears to be more natural to connect vira, a brave man, with vira, strength, than with aj, to go or shine. In much the same manner, a connection is perceptible between the Arabic bat-sh, strength, and bat-al, a champion; although Mr. Richardson adduces this very word batal as illustrating with the Persian batal, cutting, separating, the difficulty or impossibility, which he maintains to exist in discovering the connection of words in these languages by the ear or eye. The difficulty is frequently experienced, but the impossibility can be affirmed only when the intermediate links of a connection are ascertained

* Properly ojas; but the Sanskrit long o is a compound of a and u; and in the Indo-European class au=o, from oj, to be vigorous.

to have utterly perished.* Words of like sound are produced by the same organs, and must originally in related languages, have expressed the same conception, which, in process of time, gives birth to a figurative sense, whence other terms may arise. The last of the derivations will appear to have no affinity in signification whatever with the original conception, but if the form of the conception be preserved or discernible, the connection may be affirmed, although its precise nature cannot be declared. In the case of the Persian, batal, cutting, and Arabic batal, a champion, are not so widely remote as the Oriental lexicographer imagines. The occupation of a champion, a soldier, a hero, is cutting and killing, and to pursue it with success he must be endowed with great bodily strength. The Arabians appear to have used batal in reference to this quality, and the Persians to have taken it in a figurative sense.† With respect to the rule which has produced the suspicious etymology of vira, from aj, if words, significant of ideas, are to be accounted for by the addition or rejection of letters, in order to accommodate them to a law, which is

* Between the Persian khâher, a sister, and the modern German schwester, a sister, there seems to be as little connection as between schwester and the Latin soror, a sister: yet nothing is more certain than their common and direct relation to the Sanskrit swasri, a sister. The Sanskrit sw becomes kh in the corresponding Persian words, and the s becomes h. In a great number of Latin words, an r appears in the place of the ancient s, and the contrary, and it is not improbable that in the Latin of Numa, soror was written suosor. In the Ossetish cho, a sister, is a contraction of chorra, where the ch like the Persian kh represents the Sanskrit sw, and if we may suppose swosor, we have a word not much unlike the A.-S. sweostre, a sister, and if a sworra, a word not unlike soror.—See Pott, Etymologische Forschungen, I. p. 71.

† The Arabic word agrees with the Sanskrit bhadilah, a hero, or servant, which Sanskrit grammarians refer to the root bhad, to prosper, be happy; but considering the signification of the Sanskrit, Persian and Arabic terms, its more probable etymon is bath, to be strong, or even vath, to be able, possess ability. The d and th in these words are palatal and cannot be correctly represented in English characters. Our word battle, which we have from the French, appears to belong to this class.

CHAP.
X.

subsequent to the perfection of speech, we might derive coach, after the same manner as vira, from ah! the interjection of admiration or surprise at the first sight of the vehicle, by merely adding co, and interposing a c.

Vir.

5. Vossius perceived the peculiar force of the Latin vir, when he attempted, on the erroneous principles of philology which prevailed till within a few years, to derive it from vis: “A vi, non quod vi agat feminam: sed quod major in eo vis quam feminis.” Isidorus also referred the Latin baro, a mercenary soldier, correctly enough to the Greek “βαρες, gravis, quia sunt fortes,”* but he mistook similarity of orthography for a proof of etymology, and he blundered in supposing that the Latin term was derived from the Greek adjective. They are cognate words, and their agreement is radical. The Sanskrit virah,† which Mr. Wining gives as viras, though the visarga denotes an h and not the sibilant, was received into the European family of languages in the sense of a strong man, and varied in them accordingly as each dealt with the mute initial and the vowels. This is most remarkable in the Gothic, where the guna, or reflective influence of the final a, has produced the diphthong ai in vair=vir, a man. In Lettic and Old Prussian, vyr-a appears to be the Sanskrit scarcely altered, and in the Lithuanian, vyr-s, the a is entirely dropped, to receive a syllable of formation, independent of the root. The V of the original becomes of F or B and W in the other languages, and hence there is no difficulty in recognizing the prevailing idea. In fact the different words constitute two families of collateral descendants from the same stock. Taking vira, strength, to be the root, we have the following genealogies, in the arrangement of which, respect is had only to the conformity of the consonental initial:—

* Mercenarii sunt qui serviunt accepta mercède, iidem et Barones Græco nomine, quod sint fortes in laboribus: βαρες enim dicitur gravis, quod sit fortes barones.—De Orig. l. ix. c. 4. Ver-a, S.=Bar-us Gr.

† Hence Virasaya, (the hero's sleep), is the name of the plain on which Indra is said to have been conquered by Gangeyanas the son of the river Goddess, Ganga; and hence too the title of the vanquisher Viranja-jit, the conqueror of the hero, or Indra.—See Asiat. Researches, v. III. p. 430.

CHAP.
X.

VIRah, S. a strong man.
VAIRya, Zend. Gr. H'ERO?
VIR, Lat. man or husband.	BAR-o, Lat.
FIR, A.-S.; FIRR, O. Norse; FAR, Burgundian.	VAIR, Goth.; VYR-a, Lett.;
BER, Norweg.; BAR, Longob., Ripuar. and Frank.; BÆR, O. Germ.; BER, O. French.	VYR-s, Lith.; VAIR and VAR, Span.
	WER, A.-S.; WEHR, Germ.

The Norse fir-r is the same as the Lettic and Old Prussian vyr-s, the syllable of declension being always interchanged, and the same as the A.-Saxon fir, which also appears as feor-h. Firar, strong men, heroes, is explained in the Glossary of the Edda, to be guardians of the earth, but even in the poem in which it is found,* it denotes no more than virī, strong men, heroes. The Burgundian far occurs in the Latinized form of farones, answering to the like form of the Spanish varones, that is, barons; and as the original seat of the Burgundians was Bornholm, a corruption of their own name Burgenda Holm, the island of the Burgundians, the word is manifestly the same as the Norwegian ber and bar, and the older Norse firr. The Gothic vair is no more the whole word than the Latin baro; both take a nasal consonant in oblique cases; thus baro, barones plu., and vair, vairans plu.; so also far and var make farones and varones,† whence the conclusion is inevitable, that the immediate ancestor of the word baron, is the Germanic form of vir, namely, bar, a man, strong, as distinguished from woman; free, as distinguished from Romans and serfs.

Both forms, bar-i and bar-ones, occur in the Barbaric Barones.

* Hindu Liodh, 3.

† Varones occurs in the Spanish for men, i. e. soldiers:—

“Entendio Alexandro luego las volentades, Dixoles: y a Varones quiero, que ne oyades.”

CHAP
X.

codes, where they are unquestionably their own forensic terms adapted to the Latin context. In the Salic Law, "baronem" and "mulierem" are put in opposition; and in the Ripuarian law, "feminam" is contrasted with "baronem." In the same code, "barum" opposes "feminam." In the Ripuarian code, "Si quis morttaudit barum aut feminam,"* any man and any woman are intended; while in the Salic Laws, "Si quis baronem de via ortraverit," is followed by "Si vero mulierem ingenuam,"† so that the baronem was also ingenuum or well born, that is a Salic, not a Roman, and therefore free and noble. The same sense is attached to the Ripuarian, "Quod si quis hominem regium tabularium, tam baronem quam feminem."‡ Again, it is to be noticed that the barus of the Ripuarians corresponds with the baro of the Longobards, both being employed to designate one of themselves: thus a law of the former runs: "Si ancilla fuerit, solvat sol. 1. Si barus fuerit, similiter. Si servus fuerit medium solidum;"§ and a Longobardic enactment is, "Si quis homicidium perpetraverit in barone libero vel servo."|| Thus the same agreement is found between the Latinized bari and barones, as between the Latinized farones or varones and the Gothic vairans; and the old scholiast on Persius had noticed "barones vel varones," as existing in Gallic,¶ by which we must understand German or at least Gallo-Belgic.

Thus much was necessary to explain the source of a word, which has unaccountably been considered of uncertain etymology; as to the thing denoted by it, there is

* Tit. 76. By some mistake, Spelman, in quoting this law, has "mortandit," which has no meaning. Mr. Cruise has not only copied the error, but mistaken the codes.

† Tit. 34, n. 1 & 2.

‡ Tit. 58, de Tabulariis, n. 12.

§ Tit. 95.

|| L. I. tit. 9, n. 3.

¶ Gallorum lingua barones vel varones, dici servos militum, qui utique stultissimi sunt, servi videlicet stultorum.—Cornut. ad Pers. S. v. apud Du Cange.

little difficulty. Before the body of an army consisted of soldiers, that is of mercenaries and hirelings,* every citizen capable of bearing arms was a warrior. All fighting men were strong men, and hence they were vairans, firar, veras, or baren, according to the dialect which they used. The "barones nostri," in the Longobardic Laws,† denote those fighting men who were directly employed by the king, about his person, and who received from him sustenance in kind, or its representative, the means of sustenance in land, in a subsequent age known to the Latin writers as their feodum or food.

But where every fighting man, and every holder of land under terms of military service was denominated a baron, it necessarily happened that the more considerable sought a means of distinction. In England, all the manorial lords were barons, who were bound by their tenure to assist in parliament. The number was too great for convenience, and by and by only the more powerful barons were summoned. From this circumstance arose the distinction of Greater and Less Barons, which is fully explained by Sir Harris Nicolas, in his useful Synopsis of the Peerage. Other countries experienced the same necessity, and adopted the distinction,‡ which they also expressed in a different manner, and it is remarkable that the greater barons fell back upon the general appellation, man and homo.

6. In Norse rikr, and in A.-S. rice, powerful, from the Sanskrit ragh, to have power, combined with man, served for the purpose of denoting a person of eminent rank.§ The A.-Sax. rice is the French riche and English rich; a

Richmen or Barons.

* There can be no reasonable doubt of Staden's derivation of soldier from selen, to give, deliver, offer, and that it is the cognate of the English sold. The word 'soldurius' is used by Cæsar, (De Bell. G. l. III. c. 22.) and means a soldier for hire.

† L. I. tit. 13.

‡ "Varones majores," in the will of Ramirez of Arragon, about 1062.

§ See p. 179, 180.

CHAP.
X.

rikr man or madr, and a rich man, was a powerful man.* In the History of Hervor, it is equivalent to hofding, the captain, chief or governor of a province.† Gestr Blindi, in some Sagas designated a king, was the name of a rich man in Gothland, who was the king's most formidable enemy.‡ He was the sovereign of that which is now a province, and named after him Gestrícia, that is Gests rícki, or Gestsrícki, Gests power, or seat of power, namely, his kingdom. When it was known at Drontheim, that Harald Harfager was appointing earls over the subdued provinces, "then many rich men (rikis menn) sought king Harald, and became his vassals."§ The historian of the Feroe Islands describes Earl Hafgrim, the hofding of Suthrey, in terms which show a distinction observed between a rich or powerful man, and a mere man of wealth.|| In the Bavarian Laws, about the beginning of the sixth century, the rich man is translated "homo potens," and denoted a man on whom the grave or fiscal judge was unable to distrain, without the assistance of the duke.¶

The Goths brought this title of rich man with them into Spain, where it long served to denote the second order of barons. In the fourteenth century, the laws of the Cortes

* King Alfred, in translating the words of Orosius "sequitur discessio plebis a patribus," uses "rican men and earmran," the rich and poorer men, that is, the nobility and commoners.—Fo. 97.

† 'Nu er Suafurlami spurdi fall fod^r syns, tok han under sig ryke thad allt til forrada, er fader hans hafdi att, ok vard rykur madhr.'—Now when Swafurlami heard of his father's death, he took under his power for a government, all that his father had possessed, and became a rich man,—namely, a man possessed of a ríke or kingdom.—Herv. S. c. 2

‡ Giestur Blindhi het madhur rykr i Gautlandi; hann var hinn mesti ovin kongs.—Ib. c. 14. fo. 12.

§ Enn er thetta spurdhiz um Thrandheim tha soktu, til Haralds kongs marger rikis menn, oc giorthiz hanns menn.—Haralds ens Harfagra Saga, c. 6.

|| 'Ríkr madhr ok hardhfengr, audhigr at fe.'—A powerful and strong man, wealthy in substance.—Færeyinga Saga, c. 4.

¶ Lex Baioar. tit. v. n. 8.

were passed by the king, "with the assent of the prelates, the ricos omes or rich men, i. e. nobility, and the deputies of cities and towns."* These, in the century preceding, were styled "omes buenos," (good men) in the public; but in the succeeding centuries they were separated, and the terms stand in the order, nobles, knights, esquires and good men.† Du Cange quotes a letter of Charles the Fair of France and Navarre, creating Alfonso of Spain, his "baronem et ricum hominem;" and he observes that in the kingdom of Arragon, the barons were the rici hombres or rich men, that is, such as could bring a large number of vassals into the field, for they had received this notion of the word together with the word itself from the Goths, with whom power and a multitude of followers were synonymous, and those who possessed them were rich men. In the same sense, the Franks called such nobles as brought standards and vassals into the field, rich men. Ricos hómes, in the old Spanish Laws denoted the higher grades of the nobility, the earls, counts and barons of other nations.‡

7. The same class were called in old English 'heie men,' that is, high or great men, equivalent to the grands hommes or 'grandees' of the continent:—

Heie Men, Nobility.

"At Londone a parlement, and heie men mani on Ther lokede tho that alle that armes bere Agen the king in the warre, other agen him were
At Northamtone, at Lewes, other at Evesham, Barun, erle, other knigt, burgeis, other fre man."§

* Con acuerdo de los perlados, e de ricos omes, e procuradores de los cibdades e villas.

† Fijos dálgo, cavalleros e escuderos e omes buenos.

‡ 'Ricos hombres segund custumbre de Espanna son llamados los que in las otras terras dizen Condes o Barones.' Ricos hombres, according to the custom of Spain, are those whom in other countries they call Counts or Barons.—De la Partida, l. x. tit. 25. p. 4.

§ Robert of Gloucester, p. 562.

CHAP.
X.Goodmen, fighters,
knights.

8. The term good man was commonly applied to the smaller baron in other countries besides Spain. To understand this appellation in its Gothic sense,—for the Latin bonus homo is no more than a translation of it, whence the French, Italian, and Spanish terms used in the same acceptation,—we must remember that the virtue most esteemed by warlike nations is courage, and that in all the Gothic dialects, the word good signified bold, brave. “There were slain,” says the Saxon Chronicle, “Athelstan, the king’s relation, Oswy, his son, and many other good thegns.”* Just so in old English we have “moni other gode knyghtes,” and —

“Eustas erl of Boloyne and mony god knygt therto.”†

In this situation it could not mean otherwise than brave, for nobility is implied sufficiently in the term thane and knight, and it would at that time have been superfluous to use good in the sense of noble, which it afterwards received. This consideration is an answer to those who please themselves with the idea that god, good, and God, the supreme being, are the same word. Independently of that, it is justly observed by the reviewer of Grimm’s Teutonic Grammar, in Blackwood, that “the words are essentially distinct: the radical vowel in the name of the Deity being a short u [a he should have said], while in the adjective for good, it is a long or double a. The true etymology of the Divine name is still a dark and disputed question.” The adjective good, in the sense in which it was originally understood by the Gothic nations, appears to have been founded upon the Sanskrit ghut, to strike in return, while good, Goth. guds, virtuous, seems related to gud, to preserve. Although ghut affords a natural explanation of goodman, the Sanskrit yudhmah, a warrior, (yuddhman,

* Thær wæs ofslægen Æthelstan thæs kynges athum, and Oswig his sunu—and feala othra godra thegna.—Ann. 1010 war), bears so close a resemblance that the claim of ghut is not immediately acknowledged. It will be remembered that yudh, to fight, was shown to be the original of the A.-S. gudh, war, and that in the other Teutonic dialects, an n is inserted, gund, gunni; now if yudhmah were the original of our goodman, we might, from analogy, expect gundman and gunnman, which is not the case, for the Norwegians wrote gudheman, and the old Germans quotman. There is, however, a great probability that judex, originally a military officer, is connected with yudhika, one that lives by his sword.*

† Robert of Gloucestre, p. 393.

With respect to the concluding observation in the critique just quoted, it may be answered that when we find that the Sanskrit god, to thunder, gave the epithet of Gadi to Vishnu, we may doubt whether there is any obscurity in the etymology of our name of the Supreme Being. There is no impiety in ascertaining the true meaning of a word, considered only as a word. It is not shocking that the Latin div-us, contracted de-us, di, us, and the Greek the-os and ze-us, should have their origin in the Sanskrit devah, a god, that is, an inhabitant of div, the sky, and that this very div was probably suggested by the cry of the hawk. The people who invented words, were not theologians, and they may surely be excused, if, considering thunder to be the awful voice of their maker, they denominated him from the circumstance, by which he most strikingly manifested himself to their apprehension.†

* Judex and judicium, are commonly said to be compounded of 'jus dico,' a sort of etymology like that of gallows from 'they gall-us.'

† After all, it was a pity to disturb the Gothic etymology, but a word without a meaning is valueless, and in philology a false meaning cannot be retained. One of the Edinburgh Reviewers produces the following line of words as presenting resemblances: Sans. devat, Pers. khoda, Germ. Gott, Engl. God (vol. XIII. p. 374); and others have been induced to pronounce decisively for the Persic. Besides the grosser material conception of this word, there are philological objections to its adoption as the etymon of gudh and god. In the first place the Pers. character khe, is a gentle mo-

CHAP.
X.

The short a of gadi became the long u of the Gothic Gudh, and the long o of the A.-S. God; while the short u of ghut was retained in the guds and gods of the former, and the god, good, of the latter. We do not find the Gothic word in any other sense than these two, good, vir-dulation in the throat, difficult to any but a native, and would scarcely be supplied by the strong guttural; god is one of a class of words which people did not borrow from each other; in the third, supposing a transmission to have taken place, the second syllable would have been retained, as it is long and emphatic. A word formed from khoda would have been hodak-s. We gain nothing satisfactory or pleasing by this erroneous etymology. Khoda, also written khuda and khuday, is connected with the Arabic khudari, very black, a black camel, a black cloud, and khudarit, a dark night, a black eagle. Blackness is the essential idea of khoda, and the oriental deities were black as negroes. The awful aspect of a dark cloud, the precursor of a storm, no doubt originally suggested this idea of the celestials. The appellation of gadi, from thunder, is liable to none of the preceding objections. It is not a borrowed term in the Gothic dialects, for it is almost incontestible from the perpetual affinities of words and the internal structure of the languages, that the Gothic or Germanic nations, who are better classed as Sakasens, spoke dialects of Sanskrit. If they did not retain the radical signification of gudh and god, it was because they found a loftier destiny for it, and because they universally concurred in employing the word thunder, which appears in Lat. (tono), tonitru; Germ. donder, Norse, dunr, Sanskrit s-tanita, which also appears in the forms of stun, astonish, (thunder strike), &c. The English or Saxon aspirated word seems to be related to the Sanskrit dhwana, a great noise, a din, in the compound abbhradwhana, the sound of the clouds. Men can name beings, which are not the objects of the senses, only by means of the terms which they originally applied to matter and its properties, to objects of their senses and to their qualities. If it were possible to invent a word without relation to the matter, it would recal no idea to the mind; it could not create one; and it would be of no use. Cabalistic words, and the barbarous compounds of the old logicians and the memoria technica, are only the representatives of other words, and therefore come within this observation, and are really significant, at second hand, of sensible ideas. This necessity of language exonerates the etymologist from favouring the errors of materialists. If he is so successful in his researches as to detect the sensible idea of abstract terms, he does not prove that what we talk of is matter, but that matter is the vehicle of our thoughts. We should reason very erroneously indeed, if we inferred from the radical import of gadi, that the Brahmans believed that god was thunder, or thunder a god, or that he, whom they believed to have created the universe, and for whom they had innumerable names tuous and good, noble, of which the reason is undoubtedly the nature of the only literary production in that language. But even in the latter acceptation we may detect a derivative meaning from ghut, to strike in return, for to be distinguished in war was to be notable, and therefore noble.

In its first application, then, Goodman was a bold fighter; in its second, it denoted a nobleman, whence it descended to become an humble, if not contemptuous appellation.

Among the epithets of a martial prince in Beowulf, none occurs more frequently than gudh-cyning, a war king:

Swa sceall gudh fruma gode gewyrcean fromum feoh giftum on fædre feorme
thæt hine on ylde
eft gewunigen wil gesidhas
thonne wig cume.*

So shall a war prince work for his good with wise fee-gifts
in his father's support that to him in his age again may resort his chosen nobles
when war shall come.

There is a striking resemblance to the ear, in the words gudh, war, and good, brave, but this passage decides on Anglo-Saxon principles against Dr. Bosworth's derivation of derived in like manner from the sensible manifestations of his power, was one of his own creating. One of the most sublime passages in the most sublime of oriental compositions is constructed solely on this same notion of thunder being a manifestation of the deity: "He directeth the sound, that goeth out of his mouth under the whole heaven, and his lightning unto the ends of the earth. After it a voice roareth; he thundereth with the voice of his excellency; and he will not stay them when his voice is at hand. God thundereth marvellously with his voice; great things doeth he which we cannot comprehend."—Job, 37.

Having neither intention nor desire to mislead on a subject of such high interest as the name of the Supreme, I beg to state the opposite opinion of M. Diefenbach in favour of the Persian khoda, which in the following classification he makes equivalent to the Sanskrit swadatta, self-created:—"Osset. chudav = Dugor. chtsau = Pers. khodâ = Kurd. chudi = Afghan. chudai, from Zend. khadatta = Sskr. svadatta = selbstgeschaffen."—Heideberg. Jahrsbuch. 1839, p. 456, n. Had men no name for God before they began to reason upon his mysterious nature?

* Introd. l. 39.

CHAP.
X.

one from the other. The words are brought together, and found to be distinct; we are, therefore, sent back to the primitive meaning of good, prompt in battle. This was the first virtue of a people whose existence depended upon their bravery, and the word virtue itself, radically denotes the possession of those bodily powers, by which a man is capable of becoming good. In the Gothic Gospel, as before observed, we find the word only in its secondary or derivative sense. Joseph of Arimathea is styled guda ragineis, "an honourable counsellor" (Mark, xv, c. 43), and a certain nobleman (Luke, xix, 12), is manna godakunds, a man of good, that is, noble race (gods, good, and kuni, family, race). But what we do not find in Gothic, is common in the other dialects. In the famous German ode, on the victories of king Louis, composed in the eighth century, guotman, a goodman, is unquestionably a term of nobility:

Ther ther thanne thiob was Ind er thanana ginas;
Nam sine vaston
Sidd warth her guotman.

He who then was a robber,
and therefore of no account,
took his fastnesses,
and afterwards he was a nobleman.

Schilter renders the last line "ex quo factus is nobilis." In some cases the word is used like barons, to denote the nobility,—

Sina goda mæn læt han sammankalla.
His goodmen he ordered to be summoned.*

This application of the term is found in the public acts of Norway, down to the fifteenth century; and in a declaration of rights, the godhe mæn of Norway complain that they were not summoned to parliament by writ or messenger from the king. The addition of good, in the sense of doughty or valiant, to the title of knight, was also common: thus in the poetical fragment on Charlemagne: CHAP.

* Chron. Rhythm. p. 343, apud Ihre.

X.

Ther site was under göten knechten

Sie kunden wole uechten.

V. 2372.

The custom was among brave knights,—

They knew how to fight well.

9. The “boni homines” of the Latin writers were knights: “Capti sunt usque ad numerum xxc bonorum hominum vel circiter militarium.”* This was written in the thirteenth century; but with the loss of the warlike meaning of good, the title sank into disuetude among military men, and finally subsided into the lowly appellation of a husbandman. In Scotland, it designated the tenant of the feudal lord of a manor. Sir Geo. Mackenzie says, “And this remembers me of a custom in Scotland, which is but lately gone into disuetude, and that is, that such as did hold their lands of the prince were called Lairds; but such as held their lands of a subject, though their lands were large, and their superior very noble, were only called Good Men, from the old French word bonne homme, which was the title of the master of the family.”† The scientific herald does not seem to have been aware that the title was as military and as honorable in its origin as any in his book. According to Dr. Jamieson, a Goodman is a proprietor of land, and so a laird; and he quotes the following decisive passage from Melville’s Memoirs, p.

Boni Homines.

* Chron. Comit. de Marca, apud Wachter. Gudemans, among the ancient Germans, were men of the equestrian order, according to Meibomius, the editor of Levold de Northof, quoted by Wachter. In Denmark, under Valdemar, who reigned from 1157 to 1182, Gode Mend are ranked after the Herrer or barons, in his Birckerætt, or Rights of Citizens, as revised by Christopher IV., granting that, “Danmarkis rigis undersaatter, Biskoper, Prælater, Herrer, oc Gode Mend arffueligen at haffue fult oc tilhört,”—that the subjects of the kingdom of Denmark, bishops, prelates, barons, and goodmen, i. e. knights, by hereditary right, shall have free possession.

† Science of Heraldry, p. 13, 14.

CHAP.
X.

Good Dame.

*Proud Men.
Preuds
Hommes.*

122:—"As for the Lord Hume, the Regent durst not meddle with him, he standing in awe of Alexander Hume, of Mauderstoun, Couldinknows, and the goodman of North Berwick, and the rest of that name were boasted with very proud language." This, he says, is the same person before mentioned, in connection with "divers other barons and gentlemen."* The same writer finds Gudame in a ballad which was printed in 1508:—

"My Gudame was a gay wif but scho was rycht gend."

The English counterpart was good wif, goodif, Goody.

Another appellation emanating from military, and akin to goodman, is probus homo, a contraction apparently of the phrase "præliis probatus homo," a man tried in battles. Leland, the antiquary, gives an abstract of an old Chronicle, in which it is said that "This Fulco for nobilitie was communely caullid Proudhome."† The French used preud homme, prode home, and preux homme, in a like sense. The Spanish proeza is the French prouesse, and our prowess; but preud, preudesse, Ital. prodezza, are Gothic importations, not mutilated like the Spanish. The word does not occur in the Ulphilean fragments, but its form as an adjective would be prauds, the prauda of the Sanskrit, the prudi, magnificent, of the Norse, the prud or prut of the Anglo-Saxons, and our proud. A preud homme is a proud man, but in the middle ages a man of prowess; and says Jacob, "Prodes Homines is a title frequently given in ancient records to the Barons, or other military tenants,

* Etymol. Dict., art. Gudeman. A record in Jamieson's Popular Ballads, I, 109, 111, is also given:—

"The 16 of Junii (1603), Robert Weir broken on ane cartwheel with ane coultter of ane pleuch, in the hand of the hangman, for murdering the Goodman of Warristone."—Burrel's Dairy, p. 61. The same person is called the Laird of Warristoun, and Lord Warristoun. Subsequently, it appears, a goaler was adorned with this title; and the Goodman of the Tolbooth had an Under-Goodman.

† Collect. vol. I, p. 237.

who were called to the king's council, and were no more than discreti et fideles homines, that gave their counsel and advice according to the best of their knowledge." Discreet and loyal they might be ; but from the Norse use of prudi, the law term had probably reference to possessions and station in society. The Sanskrit praudah, proud, appears to be connected with the root PRID, to rejoice, be joyful ; and the first application of preud, prode, or proud, to a baron or military tenant, was the result of his splendid appearance in the field.

According to Mr. Robinson, the Italian Goodmen Buonomini were mere farmers ; but their term, like the French bon homme, is nothing more than the Latin translation of the Northern appellation. That writer says, " Under the feudal system, vassals were called the men of their lords. When slavery and vassalage began to be done away, farmers and tenants continued to be so called. They who rented the lands of a bishop, continued to be called the Bishop's Men, and such as rented the lands of the city, were called the Men of the City. The word good signified useful, profitable, convenient. Buoni Huomini or Buonomini signified countrymen, farmers, husbandmen, vine dressers, olive growers, useful members of society. Even to this day, in many English villages, Goodman, sounded Gooden, and Good-wife, sounded Goody, is the village dialect, and in this sense precisely was the word used in Italy.*

10. The Scottish Laird, being the English lord, was truly a baron, and it is so used in the public acts of the fifteenth century : " Qha sa vis not the said archarie, the laird of the land sall rais of him a wedder, and gif the laird rasis not the said pane, the kingis schiref or his ministers sall rais it to the king."† Pinkerton, however, says, " The lesser lairds, corresponding with the English lords of

* Ecclesiast. Researches, p. 456.

† Acts of James I., 1424, c. 20.—Jamieson.

CHAP.
X.

manors, form such a singular and amphibious class in the Scottish parliament, that they excite curiosity and disquisition."—"In England, the Baron was a lord, a peer; in Scotland, he was only a man of landed property."* All persons holding manors of the king were barons, before the great distinction was made between the Great and Less Barons or Valvasors, just as they are now all Lords, though not all peers.†

Hersir.

11. Hersir was the Scandinavian title corresponding with the English Baron, which, it is observable, is not used vernacularly by any other nation of Gothic or German descent. He was the next in rank to the earl, and it was enacted by Harald Harfager, that every earl, appointed to govern a province, should have four or more hersar as his assistants, to each of whom he granted twenty marks for sustentation. Verelius and other learned men differ respecting the origin of this term, which for the most part they regard as connected with herad or hundred. But the herads were governed by kings, until they were superseded by earls. There is a mode of examining the term, which has been overlooked. The final r is the grammatical syllable of formation, and therefore, hersir cannot be divided into herr, army, and sir, a lord, as suggested by Resenius.

* Hist. Scotland, vol. I, p. 359, p. 363.

† Lords of towns are classed after knights, by Robert of Brunne, p. 277 :

—"Thre erles, thre barons,

And mo be five score knyghtes and lordes of touns."

This writer is very irregular in his orthography of the word. Sometimes he has lauerd, (like the Saxon Chronicle, an. 675.) Sometimes lauerid, and at others louerd, whence the transition to lorde is direct. Lorverd is found in Robert of Gloucester, p. 441 and 442:—

"Heo was to prout agen hyr lorverd, vor her heyenesse, Vor heo was eyr and kynges dogter and eke emperesse."

The immediate connection between lavord, laverd, and hlaford, should decide the question raised among English etymologists, as to the origin of the former. They may observe a similar process in the A.-Saxon lafere, producing the Scottish larrock, and English lark, and old English laverk having intervened.

It is hersî-r, and in this form it seems to be the Sanskrit irsa, a governor, with an aspirate.

CHAP.
X.

12. The German term for baron is Freyherr, and generally supposed to be compounded of frey, free, and herr, lord or master. But what this herr is, whether a part of the title her-zog, a duke, or an independent derivative from the same original has been disputed. In Anglo-Saxon it was hearra, in old Norse herra,* and in Frankish and Alamannic, herro and heroro; and if the supposition respecting freyherr be correct, there were some of these barons free, and others not free, or slaves, which is absurd. The term has not, therefore, been truly explained. All these titles are military, and refer, not to the possession of land, which originally was not cared for, but to the people whom the titled leaders conducted from place to place, wanderers and freebooters, until they made or found a settlement. We have seen that the Gothic harjis was the oldest form of the German and Saxon here, army or people, and that the leader of the host was called the heretoga or herzog. From the same Sanskrit root hrî, implying forcible seizure, which produced the name of the army, came also hearra and herro, which has subsided into herr, a lord. It denotes one that takes by force, a robber, when robbery was an honourable occupation,† and it is found hari, a lion, war, and Heri, an epithet of Vishnu, whom the Greeks converted into Hercules. But as all the members were equally herren, a title was wanting for the officers subordinate to the heretoga and herzog. Tacitus mentions that their officers were elected in the national assemblies,

Frey Herr.

* Thegar Kare hafde feingid sarid, sagde hann til kongs,—herra, eg man hia Odni gista.—Hromunds Saga, c. 2.

† In order to have an idea of the brigandage exercised by nobles at the epoch when charters were first granted, it is sufficient to examine some of them, and the lord will be found assuring his tenants: "I promise not to rob (voler) and sieze the goods and moveables of the inhabitants, and to exempt them from all rapine and other bad customs, and no longer to commit exactions against them."—Dict. de l'Anc. Regime, art. Chartres.

CHAP.
X.

and that a name should be deduced from that circumstance is no more remarkable than the discovery of the title of a people of oriental origin in the Sanskrit root. As heri is the original of herro, hearra, so vri, to choose, elect, has given the term fri, as it appears in the old German title, friherr, which the moderns have mistaken for freyherr, and which in the old laws was ranked with that of fürst, meaning a chief.* In Sanskrit, the word varya, formed from this root, signifies the chief, that is the select, chosen. If this derivation of friherr be correct, something like consistency is restored to the corrupt title semper freyen herren, given to the four especial barons of the empire, those of Limburgh, Dussis, Weysterburgh, and Alwald. But it may be reasonably doubted whether this semper is not entirely a blunder. Joining the Sanskrit sam together, and varya, chief, a word is formed in regular manner, which may very well have become this Germanic semper, and semper frey herren may signify chief lords elected together, or at the same time, or in the same manner. Schilter, however, produces semperleut and sempermann, which he considers to be corrupted from sendbarleut and sendbar-mann, from send, conventus; whence sendbar, synodalis.† The semper in the title under consideration will, therefore, denote that they to whom it was applied, were lords of the senate, parliament, or diet. But send itself is nothing more than sen, which has already been shown to be connected with sena, an army.‡

Barn.

13. The barbarous word barnatu signified what is now termed baronage,§ meaning the collective body of barons. In France, a baron was called in the old romances, barne,

* 'Eg git der friherr sinem wuibe daz uuol hundert mark gildet, ich main Fursten und ander friherren.' The baron shall give to his wife (perhaps the morgengab, or nuptial present), but I speak of princes and other lords. —Jus. Prov. Aleman. c. 205, in Wachter.

† Gloss. Teuton. p. 732.

‡ Suprà, p. 43.

§ Capitul. Caroli Calvi, An. 817, cap. 24.

baroun, beir, beirs, ber, bers, faron and varon, and “noble ber et puissant Messiere Henry du Vergie,” occurs in the acknowledgment of homage by that nobleman to the duke of Burgundy, in 1329. The first of these terms corresponding to the A.-Saxon beorn, a nobleman, a prince, Scottish barne and berne, of which Pinkerton says that it “was at first an appellation of honor as emplying a man of capacity, when baro was baron. Next it meant simply a man, and now in Scottish and North English, a child. Such is the progression of words;” and Dr. Jamieson having quoted this passage, observes: “He is certainly right in deriving the term as primarily a title of honour, but it is very doubtful if baro and baron, the former especially, be from berne. Both he and Ruddiman err in confounding this word with barn, a child. It is more probable that bern, as originally corresponding to vir, and secondarily to homo, is radically a different word from bern or rather barn, as denoting a child. For not only is barn used in the latter sense by Ulphilas, who certainly wrote before barne or berne was used to signify a man, but in A.-Saxon bearn signifies a child, baron denotes a man, homo, (Lege: beorn, princeps homo.—Benson) a prince, a nobleman, a man of honour and dignity.—Somner. Some think that bern has its origin from the Icelandic bearn, beorn, Su. Goth. biorn, a bear, as the ancient Scandinavians used to give this term as an appellation of honour to princes, and as it was common in barbarous times for a warrior to assume the name of some wild beast to denote his courage, strength, &c.”*

14. In Persian barnā and parnā, a young man, are clearly the same as this Romance barné and A.-Saxon beorn;† and should put an end to any supposition that it is Beorn.

* Etymol. Dict. art. Bern. If berne be the Sanskrit verna, a husbandman, the meaning corresponds with that of bonde.—Suprà, p. 131.

† It is brought into juxtaposition with barn, a child, in the following passage in Beowulf, l. 4236 :—

Wif unhyre

The hideous woman

CHAP.
X.

derived from björn, a bear. The nasal termination of the latter distinguishes the Scandinavian name of this animal from the Germanic, which follow the Sanskrit barji, a wild bear, and turn the a into the diphthong æ or ea in consequence of the reflective influence of the original termination ji. From one of the oblique cases of barji, the Northmen have had their triphthongal björn. As to the meaning of the word, it appears to be a mere imitation of the animal's cry or growl in anger. In Zend, which Sir William Jones considered to be a dialect of Sanskrit, we have seen that vairya was the same as the Gothic vair, which like the Sanskrit virah, a hero, takes an n in its declension, and eventually produces varones and varon, the equivalent of baron. The Zend was old Persian, and bar-na and parna, which is the same word, may have similarly resulted from vairya. Beorn is primarily a man, and being a strong man, it is taken for an appellation of nobility. It is a derivative from the same root as baron, and must be regarded as the Anglo-Saxon form of that word: for as to the "baron" found by Dr. Jamieson in the Dictionaries, it must have been inserted on the authority of the Latin Laws of Edward the Confessor, or the French of William the Conqueror. In short, it is neither Saxon, nor used by Saxon writers.

Sire, Siresse.

15. Of the old French nobility, Selden says: "these ancient barons affected rather to be styled sire (which has a feminine siresse), and the baron of Coucy to this perhaps carried this rhyme in his device, in 1538:—

" Je ne suis roy ne prince aussi, Je suis le Sire de Coucy."

But of this elder barony or sirerie (says L'Oiseau) there hyre beorn gewræc beorn acwealde ellenlice.

avenged her child,
she slew a warrior
with fury.

Kemble.

is not one left; for they being all of great jurisdiction, have either revolved to the crown, or been erected into duchies, marquisates or counties.*

CHAP.
X.

Sire and sieur are radically the same, and have their origin in the Sanskrit sūra, a hero, a valiant man. The title exists in English, Icelandic, French and Italian, sir, sire, sira. From the Sanskrit verbal root sūra, to be valiant, came the Gothic sigora, from which, in his Glossary to Beowulf, under the word sige, victory, Mr. Kemble makes the following deduction of sire: “Signora, Goth., sihora, O. Norse, sira, A.-S., sire, Fr.”

A large signification was given to barony by old English writers:—

“ Hardeknout hys brother tho then wey sone nome,

.. .. .

Thoru the baronye of Engelond and of Denemarch al so

Ichose he was to be kyng, for hii ensented therto.†

Rich, in the primitive sense of powerful, and seignorie for lordship, in its widest extent of meaning, occurs at a later period:—

This ilk Henry is told Henry the Secunde,

As riche a prince in wold (power) in this lond sithen non funde.‡

16. So in Spain a sennorio was employed to denote a whole kingdom, as appears from a law of Alfonso X., which has this peculiarity, that it includes all the nobility of whatever rank, under the term ricos homes.§

Sires de la terre in our Norman French records, are merely landlords. In addition to what has been said of sieur, so obviously the Sanskrit sura, a hero, it may be stated that in Persic, the tenure of a military feod by mili-

* Titles of Honor, p. 539.

† Robert of Glouc. p. 325.

‡ Robert of Brunne, p. 128.

§ ‘Si algun Rico home de nuestro Sennorio denostare a Dios o a Santa Maria.’—If any man blasphemed against God or St. Mary, he was to forfeit one years profit for the first offence, two years for the second, and for the third, his whole estate.—Selden, p. 573.

CHAP.
X.

tary service is denominated sujūrghāl, which appears to be formed upon the Sanskrit sura, to be valiant, chal, to maintain, and so may be explained by the western term, a knight's fee, that is, the aliment of a soldier, in land in lieu of stipend, in the same manner as stipend stood in lieu of food. Thus it is found that even in this term senior, the warlike establishers of the feudal system had no notion of designating a military man from a quality implying decrepitude and incapacity for the duties of his office.*

It appears on the whole that there were two descriptions of titles in the earliest times of which the history of the Germanic nations treats. One of them had reference to the chief and his obligation to support his people, and the other to the person of him that bore the title. The former were the Saxon gesidhas and German gisindin, companions and counts. The Saxon gesidh was changed to thegn, a word which has been shown to mean primarily, a receiver, a partaker of the sustentation given by the chief; and secondarily, a minister. Hlaford, lord, from its signification might serve for the aldor, a maintainer of the people, as well as for the thegenas or receiving nobility; and accordingly hlaford did denote, as its descendant, lord, does at the present day, the king and any of the nobility. In Germany graff, and in Sweden greffwe, but not until the sixteenth century, became the title of the counts; and this word, in its secondary sense of fiscal judge, corresponds to the primary signification of thegn. But this term, unlike those just enumerated, is restricted to the same class of persons by the bonds which it derives from its etymological import.

* An erroneous inference has been drawn from the employment of the Gothic sineigs as the representative of senior. For instance, in Matt. xxvii, 1, "At maurgin than waurthanana runa nemun allai gudjans jah thai sinistans manageins bi laisu," where "allai gudjans jah thai sinistans manageins" stand for "omnes sacerdotes et seniores populi." Now Ulphilas, as a faithful translator, gave the Gothic terms which most nearly expressed the literal sense of the passage; and though seniores might be a title in Latin, and although among the Jews, as among the Persians, (pir, an old man, and a title of honor,) and some other Eastern people, the terms for age, were also terms of dignity, it does not follow that the Gothic sinistans had also this secondary meaning. So closely did Ulphilas adhere to the letter of his original, that we even find him writing militondans, where the Latin has militantes.

All the remaining titles are personal; the thegn who had been a count, was properly denominated a baron in the laws of William I., for that term had reference to the manhood of the bearer. And thus it happens that the similar titles beorn and barne were applicable to any of the nobility, and even the derivative, barony, to a kingdom. Sire and seigneur in like manner, signifying victorious or conquering lord, agreed with any rank of the nobility, and inasmuch as monseigneur is still the style of addressing a prince of the blood, and sire that of a king, we may infer that they were so applied.* Jarl and earl, signifying conquerors or at least fighting men, having been early appropriated to the near relations of the king, were restricted in application, although sufficiently general and honourable to become common. The very generality of the term herr, a lord or master, was destructive of its use as a title, and it is now the property of the common people. Goodman, through the confusion occasioned by two words of the same orthography, sank into contempt; and indeed the same may be said of Richman, for though wealth gives power, the mere possession of it is an accident common to nobles,

* The seignorie of Gascony, mentioned in a preceding quotation, may be taken as an instance; for if the duchy could be correctly so styled, then was the duke a seigneur, although seigneur certainly was more commonly the appellation of an inferior vassal, as in the account of the statute of Mortmain:—

Est fet lestatut, qe counte ne baroun
Ne seyngnour de tere par my la regioun, &c.

Thus translated by Robert of Brunne, p. 239:—

Was mad an other statute that non erle no baron
No other lorde stoute, ne fraunkelyn of toun
Tille holy kirke salle gyv tenement, rent no lond
Fro tho that now lyv in to the dedis hond
Without leve of the kynge or of his counseile.

CHAP.
X.

merchants, and the vilest of mankind. Hence when rich was exclusively taken in its sense of wealthy, the nobility abandoned it as a term of honor.

Knights.

17. Strength, agility, and an enterprising disposition are qualities of the highest value among people whose very existence as herdsmen, hunters and warriors were dependent upon their courage and bodily exertions. Among many archaisms in English which might be cited in proof or illustration, there is one which originally signified rapidity of motion, then denoted success, wealth and prosperity, and has again reverted to its first sense. This is the word speedy, which king Alfred employs for successful, wealthy, and prosperous, and which fairly transports the enquirer back to the hunting stage of society. From the Anglo Saxon verb spedan, to prosper, thrive, came spedig, wealthy, the original of our speedy. Although the canon of transition requires an F for the P it will be hardly disputed that this speedy is the Sanskrit sapadi, speedy. The term is referable to the root pad, to move, but pada, the foot, is also connected with this root; and sūpad is one that has a beautiful foot—a foot perfectly adapted for running. He that could run well caught most game, and the term speedy fully described his success, and attributed it to the celerity of his feet.

If instead of honouring the old and decrepid, who not only encumbered their march, but required sustenance at their hands, the Germanic tribes barbarously put them to death, they on the other hand highly esteemed youth and vigor. Their chiefs surrounded themselves with young men, and the people, like the aborigines of North America, whom in many respects they strongly resembled, adopted the very term young man, as a title of their nobility. Dugudh, courage and valour, was the general term for the collective body of noble warriors, and geogodh, youth, is its almost inseparable companion in Bardic compositions, long after the reasons which had exalted these qualities had disappeared, and when it was found that the counsels of age and experience were more beneficial to the state than the impetuosity of the boy and the brute strength of man.

In the middle ages several terms primarily denoting a boy or youth, were used in the particular sense of a young nobleman. Such were knight, child, swain, knave; infans, puer, adolescens; enfes, enfants; infanta,—all, in different languages, corroborate Tacitus in assigning to the German youth a distinguished rank about the persons of their chiefs, princes and kings. One, infanta, of which the application was probably made by the Goths, still survives as the title of the heir apparent of Spain, and another in England still decorates the members of an order of nobility. Infants, boys, and young men, (“infantes, pueri et adolescentes”), in the language of the middle ages, denoted the sons of noblemen, not yet in possession of their paternal estates: thus puer Anglicus, was a designation of the prince of Wales; adolescens Bohemicus, was the heir apparent of Bohemia; and L’Enfant de Champagne, l’Enfant de Warewic, and l’Enfant de Cleves, are the titles in old Chronicles given to the noble heirs of those counties.* Enfés d’Angleterre also occurs:—

“ Car l’Enfés d’Angleterre estoit
Ses om, et la crois pris avoit.”

18. The ancient title of cild or child, connected as it is with the Gothic kildh-ei, the womb, gives no difficulty in respect to its primary signification. It occurs in the sense of a knight, and is applied to no less a personage than the father of the great earl Godwin.† The son of Lot, king of the Picts, receives the title of child somewhat different from that of knight:—

* Du Cange, t. iii, c. 1415.

† “ —Thæt Brihtric, Eadrices brothor ealdormannes, forwregde Wulfnoth cild. thone suth Seaxiscan. Godwines fæder eorles to tham cyninge.” —Chron. Sax. An. 1009. —That Brightric, brother of Aldorman Edric, betrayed Wulfnoth, the South Saxon knight, father of Earl Godwin, to the king.

CHAP.
X.

Chyld Waweyn, Lotys sone, thulke tyme was But of tuelf yer, and the Pope of Rome bytake was
 To norys thoru the kyng Arture, and thulke tyme rygt
 The te hym tok armes and ys owe honde made hym knygt.*

“Among the Rajpoots, baupje, sire, is an appellation of royalty, and strange enough, whether male or female, its offshoots, which form a numerous class of vassals, are called babas, infants.”†

In mediæval Latin domicella is used for the unmarried daughter of a prince or noble, and domicellus, contracted from domnicellus, the diminutive of dominus, for the son. These words are the forerunners of the old French dâmoisel in the masculine, and damoiselle in the feminine gender. Froissart calls Richard, prince of Wales, son of Edward: “le jeune damoisil Richart.” In Romance the word is indifferently damoisel and danzel, in Italian donzello. All of these are evidently titles under the same notion as that of child and enfant, of which the idea belongs to the knights of an earlier period.

That we owe dame to the French is incontestible, but it is not quite so clear that the Spanish don and English dan, which are commonly derived from dominus, have any reference whatever to a Latin source. In Robert of Brunne, it certainly appears in the form of dans, but that is altogether unusual.

Dan Dominike, Dan Godfrey, or Clement
 Be welcome newly into Kent;
 Though their bridle have neither boss nor bell,
 Beseching you that you will tell
 First of their name, &c.‡

Dan in Persic is a lord, and probably signifies a rich man, Sanskrit dhanin, wealthy, thus agreeing with several other titles already noticed as founded upon the wealth and power of the original possessor. It is the original of the

* Robert of Gloucester, p. 182.

† Col. Tod, Rajasthan, vol. I, p. 131.

‡ Lydgate, Storie of Thebes.

apocryphal Danur, the first king in Scandinavia, who is said to have given name to Denmark, and the progenitor of the Danava, or tribe of Dan, in the fables of the Hindûs.* That we do not find it in Anglo-Saxon would be an objection of little weight, since a vast number of words indisputably Oriental exist in the language of which we have no traces in the scanty remains of our Saxon forefathers.

The primary meaning of a knight, which exists in all the Teutonic dialects, is not so readily ascertained as the preceding. Cniht in Anglo-Saxon, was a boy, a servant, a soldier, a knight. The German knecht, in Old German kneht, was at first written knet, knit, cnyt, and Ihre concludes that it is foreign to the Gothic tongues, and believes it to be Scythian. The Old French naquet, appears to be the same word, and if a conjecture may be hazarded from the employment of the sons of noble relations about the persons of princes and chiefs, this knight is the Gothic ganidh-jis, a relative, kinsman, cousin, and ganidh=cognat-us, nidh=nat-us; and knet=gnat-us, the two former having the general sense of kinsman, the latter that of a son, or one born in the family.

In their military expeditions, each prince or noble was accompanied by a number of young men, who were mostly either their own sons, or the sons of noble relations.† Mention of the mago driht or band of kinsmen, is frequent in Beowulf, and the very first instance will serve to show its exact purport:—

Tha wæs Hrodhgare here sped gyfen wiges weordhmynd
thæt him his wine magas georne hyrdon

Then was to Roger success given in arms
the dignity of war;
so that his dear relations willingly obeyed him

* The Hebrew Dan has no sort of connection with this word or name.

† Jornandes, c. 58, 60.

CHAP.
X.

oth thæt see geogoth geweax mago driht micel

until their youths grew up, a mighty kindred band.

L. 137.

And we also find in a passage of Byrhtnoth, describing the office of the juvenile attendants on noblemen in the field, the term cniht, used for both a young man and a knight in the same person :—

Him be healfe stod hyse unweaxen cniht on gecampe se full cafllice
bræd of thæm beorne
blodigne gar
Wulfstanes bearn
Wulfmær se geonga.

By his side there stood Wulfstan's son,
Wulfmer the young,
a youth ungrown,
a boy in battle,
who full speedily
drew from his breast
the bloody javelin.

L. 302.

We find it also both a general term for soldier, and a title of honor. In the latter sense the Anglo-Saxons employed the word, as must be evident from their use of the Latin “miles,” in charters composed in that language. There is no other Saxon word which will answer that use of miles, and it is not likely that they would attribute miles to a person who had not an equivalent designation in his mother tongue. In a charter of Cenulf, king of Mercia, to the abbey of Croyland, in 906, he confirms to that house, “eleemosynam quam Algarus miles etiam meus dedit illis.” Had he written in Anglo-Saxon, the confirmation would have appeared in the material part at least, as follows :—“thæt ælmesfeoh swa swa him eac ær gaf Ælfgar min cniht ;” for if we substitute cempa for cniht, we shall have a word of a very wide application to express the narrow sense to which miles was restricted in this age. The same knight Elgar, or Sir Elgar, is mentioned in a confirmation of king Wihtglaf or Witlaf, to the same monastery, with the addition of another, “Item donum Oswini militis.” They are again mentioned with that title in the confirmations of succeeding Saxon kings, inserted by Ingulf, who also names “Fernotus miles et dominus de Bosworth,” and “Edmerus miles et dominus de Bolebroke,” under Hardicnute. The title miles, knight, often occurs in the subscriptions of charters under Cnute. In the charter of privileges granted to Westminster by Edward the Confessor, after the subscriptions of some bishops, abbots, and earls, some names occur with "minister," that is, thegn or baron, after them, and then follow others with "miles," in the same manner; so that there can be no doubt as to the meaning of miles among the Saxons.* "Anciently," says Selden, "none was capable of the dignity of knighthood by a constitution of Frederick II., which is also attributed to Conrad IV., but he that was descended from one that was miles, which I interpret a gentleman or nobilis, and not a knight. For Ritter and Miles often signify, in the old feudal law of the empire, a gentleman, as the word gentleman signified one nobilis, and not a dubbed knight, which is interpreted by miles factus, or cingulo militari donatus, as with us in English, qui suscepit ordinem militiæ is the dubbed knight, and him generally we call a knight; yet also the word milites denotes gentlemen or great freeholders of the country also. And they are called knights in our laws that concern either choice of coroners or of knights of parliament, although they be no created knights."

The barbarous and unsightly term Radechenistres occurs in Domesday Book, where it is applied to persons who ploughed on a manor, and owed service at the lord's court, and it is there explained that such persons were free men or free vassals.† If, as Selden supposes, these are the Rade knights of Bracton, the Domesday term is the aural orthography of the Norman surveyors, endeavouring to convey a notion of a strange title. The Radeknights have been commonly explained, after Bracton, to be riding knights, a term given to such tenants as held their lands by the service of riding with their lords from manor to chenistres.*

*Rade-

* See Selden, p. 769—771.

† "De terra hujus manerii tenebant radechenistres, i. e. liberi homines."
—"Hic radechenistres arabant, &c."—Fo. 18, tit. Glouc. Berthelay.

CHAP.
X.

manor, which, says Selden, was adjudged in the reign of Henry III, to be such a knight service as to draw wardship and marriage.* So great an authority is not to be disputed on light grounds. In king Alfred's Orosius and the Saxon Chronicle, ræd here is the cavalry, and so far corroborates this explanation; but on the other hand the term rædaneyte or associated counsellors, is of frequent occurrence in Northern compositions.† Bracton did not understand Saxon, and may have mistaken the word rædgeneat for rædcniht, an associate in counsel, namely, one of the tenants who were bound to assist in the court of the manor. This at least has the advantage of being consistent with the Domesday account of the Radechenistres, and their base service of ploughing. The word will represent rædgeneatas as well as Radcnihtas. In Orosius, we have ræd theahteras for the Roman Senators, and ræd geneatas, or, if preferred, ræd cnihtas, would be the manorial counsellors.

At first, the knight was merely a boy attendant on a prince, an aldor or altherro, and either his own son or the son of a relation. Tacitus particularly mentions the magodryht, or kindred band of youths surrounding the chief: "Hæc dignitas, hæ vires, magno semper electorum juvenum globo circumdari, in pace decus, in bello præsidium;"‡ and if he had been describing king Arthur and his Round Table, he could not have conveyed a notion of them in more explicit terms. The bravery of the German juvenes or knights is also commemorated by Ammianus Marcellinus, and lastly, the use of the term in the same sense as juvenis, that is, a martial youth, connected with their oaths and other preceding circumstances, renders it exceedingly probable, that the body of choice youths, of whom Tacitus speaks, were the knighthood and chivalry of the period.

* Titles of Honor, p. 777.

† 'Hirdmenn og rædanetye Haralds kongs sogdu honum ræd.' The courtiers and counsellors of king Harald gave him advice.—Sturlaugs Saga, c. 5, p. 7.

‡ De Mor. Germ. c. 13.

From this service and attendance in the field, cniht became an appellation equally attributable to the servant and the professed soldier. An executioner, in one of Ælfric's Saxon Homilies, is addressed as a knight, but whether in reference to his age, his office, or his profession as a soldier, is not very clear.* Considering it in the single light of a servant, Wachter deduced it from the Greek konetes, a familiar, an attendant in the household; but the word was in common use in Germany and Scandinavia, where Grecian never penetrated, and when Greek was unknown to the Gothic nations. It existed in the Danish knegt, and is found in the Irish cniocht, two circumstances decisive against a classical origin.† Dr. Grimm's law of sound-transition shows that it is indisputably the cognate of the Latin gnatus, as before stated, and gnat corresponds with the Sanskrit janata, mankind, from jana, a person, and equally to be referred to the root JAN, to produce, whence janyan, birth. The Gothic ganidhjis, before noticed, is formed like the Latin cognatus with the collective participle or preposition, but the stem of both words belongs to this class.

The old German and English writers employed it in the sense of soldier :‡—

* 'Thæt wif him (thæm cwellere) cwæth to. Cniht nim thin gold. the læs the hit the losige thæt thu lange beswunce.' The woman said to the executioner, "Knight, take thy gold, lest thy long labour be a loss to thee."—Cott. MS. Julius, E. vii, fo. 64 b.

† Horne Tooke's derivation, though seriously given, is ludicrous, "KNOT, KNIGHT, NET," says the philologer of Purley, "are past participles of cnyttan, to knit, nectere, alligare, attacher. Knight is cnytt, un attaché." Then follows a quotation in which the verb to knitte, signifies to join, unite.—Divers. of Purl. II, p. 145, 6.

‡ Ottfried, "soldier," in John, xix, 34, by knecto.

Ein thero knechto thiz gisah

loh zi ferehe er nan stah

Mit speru er thar zua gûlta

Indeta 'mo thia sita.

One of the soldiers beheld this,

CHAP.
X.

Hers and Hengist bothe that twei brethre were Mid thre schip ful of knyghtes y armed wel ynow.*

And long after the Gloucester historian, the Scottish translator of Virgil, rendered the words—

—uterumque armato milite complent.

Æn. II, 18.

“Schortly the belly was stuffit every dele
Full of knyghtis armyt in plate of stele.”

At what period it began to denominate a particular class of soldiers, and to be exclusively applied to them, is not readily ascertainable; for there were Dubbed knights before the time of Robert of Gloucester. Selden says of knighthood, that “the origin is to be deduced from the customs of the Germans and other warlike people of the north. Their use was in public assemblies, by a solemn giving of a lance or target to confer such a kind of honor, and this was done sometimes by some prince of the state, sometimes by a father or kinsman. Tacitus was a witness of it, ‘Nihil neque publicæ, &c.’ Of this nature also was that kind of adoption per arma, which Theodosius, king of the East Goths, in Italy, used to the king of the Heruli. For, as in latter ages, so then also, one person received the dignity of another. This charter of adoption is yet extant. This document he gives at length from Cassiodorus.”† Daines Barrington has the following curious observations on English knights: “The statute de Militibus, 1 Edw. II. 1307, directs that every one who was 21 years of age, and had 40*l.* a year in land, should be compelled to take upon himself the order of knighthood. On proper excuse of age or infirmity, they were to pay a proper compensation.” In a note he says, “The Marca Hispanica mentions two

And on his life he stuck
With his spear he hastened to him
And opened his side.

L. iv. c. 33, v. 53.

* Robert of Gloucester, p. 111.

† Titles of Honor, p. 438.

kinds of milites or knights, viz. those who received this honor from the sovereign, and likewise others who were obliged to provide equus cataphractus, or a large war horse: it might not be unreasonable, therefore, to pay a considerable compensation to get rid of so burdensome and expensive a tenure.* Another reason for paying the fine on becoming a knight, anciently, arose from those who were candidates for this honor, being previously subject in the houses of the great barons (who had power as well as the king, in certain districts, to make knights†), to many low and menial offices, as making the beds and serving at table; and from which they were exempted as soon as they became knights. (See St. Pelaye's Dissertation on the Antient Chevalry.) It appears, by M. Houard's late translation of Lyttleton into modern French, that even the Damoiseaux, who were the sons of princes or great lords, could not sit at the same table with their father until they had received the honor of knighthood (p. 577). Edward III. made frequent use of this compulsion to procure money, of which he seems to have been almost perpetually rapacious. In the 21st year of his reign, he grants a pardon to Ralph Shelton, for having neglected to become a knight before the battle of Crecy, after which he became a knight banneret (Rymer, p. 1, p. 10). In the 40th year of his reign, he again had recourse to the same method of raising money from his subjects (Ib. p. 1, p. 108). Charles I. in his distresses, insisted upon this compulsion of 40*l.* from those who declined being knights.‡

Chivalry and its titles were common among the ancient Scandinavians. It is related of Thorbiorg, daughter of Eric, king of Sweden, that she accomplished herself in riding, and was skilled in the exercise of the sword and shield.

* Marc. Histor. p. 260.

† They were sovereigns without the regal title. See what has been said of counts and dukes.

‡ See Anthony Wood's Life. Observations on Ant. Statutes, p. 193.

CHAP.
X.

She knew those arts as well as those knights who understood the courteous carriage of their weapons.* The very term list, signifying the place in which the knights jousted, is used in the preceding message to denote the martial exercises and accomplishments peculiar to the order of knighthood.

The remarkable difference existing in the appellations of knights of the Northern and Southern nations, proceeds no doubt from some other source than a mere opposition of taste. Lidgate's etymologies, quoted by Selden, have not been improved by subsequent writers: they explain the word, but throw no light upon the thing denoted:—

“Eques ab equo is said of very right;
And chevalier is said of chevalrie,
In which a rider called is a knight.
Arragoners don also specifie
Caballiero through all that partie
Is name of worship, and so toke his ginning
Of sporres of gold, and chiefly riding.”

The term rider, (reiter, ritter, and ridder,† riddare), appears to express the manner of performing military service; while cavaliero, caballiero, chevalier, taken from the name of the horse, appear connected with the condition of the tenure of the knight's land. In like manner the term knight, now confined to this country, was derived from the natural and artificial relation subsisting between the lord and his tenant of this rank. Thus the hobiller of the old English army‡ was denominated from the kind of horse

* Hon kunni thessa list iafnframt theim riddarum er vel kunnu oc kurteislega ad bera vopn sin.—Gautreks Saga, p. 15.

† The Obituary of St. Peter of Nestved, printed in Langbeke's Collection of Ancient Danish Writers, abounds with persons of knightly rank bearing this style, entered thus:—

Her Jören ridder, hr. Peder Botildis son, Fruve Margrita hans hostru.
Sir George, knight, son of Sir Peter Botilde,
The lady Margaret, his wife.

Script. Rerum Danic. t. iv. p. 324.

‡ At the siege of Calais, in 1350, under the earl of Kildare, there were :

with which it was necessary that he should be provided, and in fact hobiller is etymologically the very same word as the Italian cavaliero, the Spanish caballero, and the French chevalier. The Low Latin caballas, a horse, is the apparent foundation of the latter terms, and is itself the representative of the Silesian happel and hampel, the Swedish and Danish hoppa, a horse, in old English a hobby; and the connection of all these words with the Greek hippos is as obvious as that between the Latin equus, a horse, whence eques, a knight, and the Swedish oek, Danish og, and Icelandic eik-ur. In all probability, caballus, or happel, as well as hippos, has come directly from Asia, for in Sanskrit the verbal root kap, shake, move, with an ordinary termination, would form a word expressive of the jumping or hopping motion, which is said to characterise the description of horse called the hobby.*

The hobiller was therefore the English cavalier, but he was not a knight, nor like the continental cavalier, held land by the service of furnishing a great war horse. Among the ricci homines of Arragon, it was customary to assign portions of the taxes levied upon large towns and cities for the maintenance of their cavaliers, and these stipendiary portions were called “honores et cavalleriæ,” as early as 852. Hence the term cabaliero corresponds with hobiller as denoting a mercenary horseman. But the compulsion upon vassals holding a certain extent of land, to take upon “bannerets 1, knights 1, esquires 38, hobillers 27;” under lord Cobham : “bannerets 1, knights 6, hobiners 19: archers on horseback 211; archers on foot 32.”

* Kapilah so formed, is a title of Krishna, and signifies a dog; Kapila, fem. gend. a sort of cow. Grammarians however, derive these words from Kam, desire, and the termination ila. Professor Pott refers caballus to the Sanskrit kawahula, a camel, adding, “as I believe from ka + wah, quantum (!) gestans.”—Etymologische Forschungen, I. p. lxxx, and II. p. 115. This derivation has all the faults of the old school, and it does not seem probable that the name of an animal would be so formed. However this may be, kawahula, a camel, cannot be caballus, a horse.

CHAP.
X.

themselves the order and expenses of knighthood, implies an original obligation to furnish a horse for the service of the lord in the field. Such tenure of land was denominated cavalleria, chevalrie, &c. This consideration is important as conducting directly to the true signification of the title Bachelor. bachelor, which has given rise to numerous explanations more or less remote from probability.

*Knights
Bachelors.*

19. "Knights Bachellors," says Selden, who collects the principal conjectures on the subject, "are such as are received for their merit next beneath banneret, and above esquire, and an esquire eminent for his service might demand this honor as a right due to him. The more especial name by which these knights are distinguished in the elder expressions of them is that of Chevalers Bachelers. The title of Chevalers, common to all others, is plain from like cause as ritter in Dutch and eques in Latin, and the words for a knight varied only by dialects in other provincial tongues, chival making chivaler, as equus, eques. But whence that of Bachellor, or Baccalaureus Comes appears not so clearly. Some will have it a compound of baschevalier from respect to the chivaler à banner, or the banneret under whom these bachellor knights commonly served. Others from batailer or batalarii; some from bacca lauri. Some from bas echelon, as if thence bachelor were made as being the first step or degree both in learning and knighthood. But the most probable seems to be from the name bucellarii, signifying in the declining empire, as much as a soldier or military servant always ready for employment; whence being in after ages joined with chivaler, it denoted this knight who had thus received the first order of knighthood. In the Glossaries of the old Greek lawyers βουκελλαγιος is explained, first, one sent to kill, and then twice, by a soldier remaining in service. This name thus applied began to be used under Honorius, and was received in this signification both among the Romans and some of the Goths. And it was therefore, it seems, given to them because the chief provision of victual which was made for them was called boukellos, a kind of biscuit cake. The name being thus among the Romans and some of the Goths used for a soldier, became also to denote as much as cliens or feudatorius, or one that was bound to serve another as his lord or patron, and defend him as one of his guard. This we see in the Laws of the West Goths,* and Onyla, bucellarius Ætii, occurs in Gregory of Tours (l. II. c. 8), and hence it is that in some Spaniards it is interpreted by Vasallo, which generally is one that is bound by tenure of military service. Hence also came the adjective bachelereux or batchevelereux, signifying hardy and adventurous. And as in most other dignities, names that were first and yet remain so, of a farre signification, became afterwards significant for special dignities, as we see in dux, comes, miles, eques, and the rest; so Bachellor or Baccellarius (which is used by some French writers) and Baccalaureus, made for Bucellarius, and denoting at first every soldier, afterwards became, if joined to Chivaler, to signify the first degree of knighthood. And a knight bachellor thus was one that had this order of knighthood given him, wherein he served still as a bachellor. And banneret denoted them that must display their banners, and have these knights bachellors serving under them. The name of Bachellor singly was afterwards used in other senses. Sometimes for one not yet knighted, but aspiring to it, exercised arms; and from this sense it was transferred to the universities; candidates in trades, and wooers that have not been married.”†

Exactly as the word for a horse gave rise to a name applied to an estate, which was held by the service of pro-

* Quicumque in patrocínio constitutus est sub patrono aliquid adquisierit, medietas ex omnibus in patroni vel filiorum ipsius potestate consistat. Aliam vero medietatem idem bucellarius qui adquisivit obtineat. Quod si bucellarius filium tantummodo reliquerit, &c. Lib. V. tit. 3.—Selden, p. 550.

† Titles of Honor, p. 549, 550, 551.

CHAP.
X.Caballaria Chevalerie.

viding a horse, we may expect to find other denominations of estates from the condition of tenure. *Caballus produced caballaria, and cheval produced chevalerie, signifying this kind of tenement by military service. Baca, an old Spanish word for a cow, which occurs for vacca,† in a charter of St. Ramirez, king of Arragon, occasioned bacallaria, the term given to a species of rustic tenement upon a manor, implying that it consisted of so much land as might be ploughed by an ox. In this sense it answers to the old English oxgang of land. Mention of bacalaria occurs in a charter of the 9th century. In the Romance language, an estate of this kind was called bacele, bacelle, and bachele (a cow fee or cow land), which, and similar names, were understood to denote land of such an extent as to be capable of employing twenty oxen in one day. An ancient ceremonial quoted by Du Cange, uses this very term in connexion with the qualifications for a banneret: "When a knight or esquire possesses an estate of 4 bacelles, the king may deliver him a banner at the first battle at which he is present; at the second he is a banneret, and at the third a baron."‡ The holder of a bacalaria was termed bacalarius; the owner of a bacelle or bachele was a bacellor or bacheler, signifying the proprietor of this cow-land.

It appears also that the terms baccalaria dominicaria or indominicaria, were applied in the middle ages to land held and cultivated by the lord for his own family; and

* A young horse with a bit or rein, one just caught or bridled; Sanskrit kaviḥ, a bit, and balah, a colt, the etymological equivalent of Engl. foal.

† The Sanskrit bhaga, an anatomical term, agrees etymologically with vacca, baca, Engl. bag, which answers to the English bag(g)ing, for sacking, made of the same cloths as bags, sacks, &c. Cow, Lat. ceva, Sanskrit gau, (first case of go, the crude noun) a cow, is so called from its excrement, which was used in sacrificial fires.

‡ Quand un chevalier ou écuier a la terre de quatre bacelles, le roy lui peut bailler banniere, à la premiere bataille où il se trouve; à la deuxieme il est banneret, et à la tierce il est baron.

this materially assists us in attaining to the meaning of Bachelor, when it denotes a young man unmarried, or a young soldier, or the candidate for knighthood. The rustic baccalarii, or bachelors, when the other tenants accompanied their lords to the field, staid at home, in order to perform the agricultural duties so necessary to the subsistence of the whole; and mention is made in charters of “bacalaria facere,”—“la bachele faire,” meaning their services in ploughing with oxen, although they might not be serfs. On urgent occasions these men were employed as recruits, whose duties were to be learned before they could be admitted to an equality with the other tenants, who served on horseback, and were chevaliers. About the 13th century, bachelors begin to be mentioned as tenants of land liable to furnish one chevalier d’ost, or in portions of half, a third, or a quarter. These, therefore, were bachelors holding a knight’s fee, or the parts of a knight’s fee usually rated, and their contribution to the service, when not personally performed, was computed in the same manner. From mere rustics they had become military tenants, but of a rank subordinate to the knight, whence bas chevalier; and the term poor bachelor often occurs in Froissart and others, in reference to the smallness of their retinue, which precluded them from the privilege of displaying banners:—

“A un chevalier baceler
Ki par pauvreté vot aller Droit en Pulle a Robert Wiscart, &c.”*

Both chevaliers and esquires became bachelors in respect of their land, and their candidateship for a banneretcy,

* Men of the highest nobility were bachelors before they were received into the order of knighthood: thus the earl of Gloucester, in the reign of king Stephen, gives this title to the earl of Chester:—

“Syre yong bachellor, he sede, wel me wytyth thys
That thun (thou) art strong and corageus, and nougt unworthy also
The vorste chyvalrye in the batayle to do.”

Robert of Gloucester, p. 453.

CHAP.
X.Haystalders.

and the expression knight bachelor is a compound of two substantives, and not a substantive and adjective, as it appears to have been regarded by Selden and other writers.

20. It may not be disadvantageous to refer to the same class of persons in the Teutonic parts of Europe, the Hagestolten of the old Germans, the hægstealdra of the Anglo-Saxons, and the Haistaldi of the Low Latin writers. The earliest occurrence of this term is in the poem of Beowulf, in which the haystalders appear discharging the office of armour-bearer to a superior:—

“Cwom tha to flode fela modigra heag stealdra hring net bæron
locene leodho syrcan.”

Line 3072.

Came then to the flood many proud
bachelors:
they bore the nets of rings,
the locked mail shirts.

And in the fragment of an ancient poem, published by Dr. Hicks, which has been entitled the Battle of Finsburgh, the term is used in a military acceptation:—

“Thonne hnæfa guldon his hæg stealdas
hig fuhton fif dagas
swa hyra nan feol
driht gesidha.”

Line 82.

Then the knaves rewarded their bachelors,
who fought for five days,
so that none fell
of the lordly companions.

Adelung says that cælebs, in Raban Maurus, is Hagestolt, but this is clearly the secondary signification, as it is of bachelor. It occurs in this sense in the old German Chronicle of Brunswick;* but in a charter of the monastery of Soissons, in 858, haistaldi are rustics residing upon an estate and adscript to the glebe, which, corresponding as it does with the early sense of bachelor, is probably the primary meaning of the term. We are still at a loss for its etymology. M. Rimius gives the following account of a singular law concerning it in its secondary acceptation. In speaking of the duke of Brunswick who died in 1714, he says:—"To close what we have to say of Anthony Ulric's reign, it may not be amiss to mention that in his time, or rather, according to others, in that of his successor, a very odd, though customary law, called Jus Hagestoltzium, came to be abrogated. A man that had lived a Bachelor to the age of 50, was named by the antient Germans a Hagestoltze, and that part of his succession which he himself had acquired, escheated after his death to the treasury of the government, probably as a punishment for not having entered the married state. The law did not prevail throughout all Germany, but only in the lower Palatinate, in some parts of the Upper Rhine, and the country of Brunswick, in which last it was thought fit to annul it. It does not readily appear when this law began to be in force, nor whence the word Hagestoltze is derived. All that can be said thereupon is as follows:—The antient Germans called a family seat Haga, and a little habitation stoltze. The eldest son inherited the Haga, or the family seat of his father, while the other children received but a small portion of his succession. It often happened that families chose to live together, in which case the younger brothers built little habitations or Stoltzen near the Haga of the elder brother, which was the occasion that they came to be called Hagestoltzen. As these younger brothers had inherited little or nothing, and were not in a condition to maintain a wife, they lived for the most part a single life, so that it is not improbable that from thence all old bachelors received the name of Hagestoltzen."*

* An. 859. ‘Hertog Ludeleff de legt na dre sone, Bruno, Danckwart, de bleven hagenstolte, sonder Otte, de was de jungeste, de nam eyn wyff.’—Duke Ludolf left three sons, Bruno and Danckwart, who continued bachelors, and Otto, the youngest, who took a wife.—Chron. Saxon. Antiq. (Brun. Chron. Picturatum, p. 299.)

The German word stoltze, in the sense of proud, is the etymological equivalent of the Latin stult-us, and cannot be considered as the original of the compound. Du Cange, who first suggested the derivation of bachelor from baca, is less successful in his conjecture on Haistaldi, which he divides into haie, a mansion, and stal, a seat. Such a compound, presenting no idea that is not contained in each of its parts separately, would not be formed and used by a whole people. His etymology does not account for the latter part, which is stald and not stal, nor does it account for the same word in the Anglo-Saxon. According to Wachter, the houses of peasants upon the estates of their lords were called haistald and hestald, and he observes, that as in peace they were husbandmen, so in time of war they were soldiers, and hence the word may have come to denote tyro, a new soldier. Apparently the hag or hæg denoted the cultivated and inclosed parts of an estate, and staldi, stealdra, the occupiers of those parts: at all events, the Gothic ga-staldan signifies possidere.

* Memoirs of the House of Brunswick, p. 355.

CHAP.
X.

In the extract from the Battle of Finsburgh, the knaves are mentioned as superior to the hagstalders, and, judging from the constitution of an ancient army, the former were the cavalry and the latter the infantry. Ariovistus had six thousand cavalry, and an equal number of men on foot, who were selected on account of their fleetness and courage. They accompanied and kept up with the cavalry, and when a horseman fell wounded, they gathered round him, and in fact afforded him the same aid which in a later age was rendered by the esquires to dismounted knights. Some disposition of the same kind existed in the German army, and there seems no reason to doubt that the bachelor or hagstalter was, in early times, the foot-soldier appointed from the better sort of the tenantry to attend on their lord in battle. In process of time, the other applications of the words to candidates, for various kinds of promotion, would easily and naturally follow.

King Alfred, according to Malmesbury, conferred the honor of a knight bachelor upon his son Athelstan. Unfortunately the Saxon authority for this fact does not exist, and we can only infer from the use of the term heagstealder in these poems, that it was the title employed on this occasion. Bachelor occurs in the reign of Henry III. in a sense which will admit the interpretation of an unmarried man, as well as that of a military candidate, or inferior knight:—

“Ych wo the marie with the thridde part of my londe
To the noblest bachelor, that thine herte wol to stonde.”*

In conclusion, it may be observed, that in the 16th century, the designation was not restricted to the male sex:—

Wee do not truste your uncle, hee woulde keepe you
A batcheler still, by keeping of your person :
And keepe you not alone without a husband
But in a sicknesse.†

21. The bachelor was therefore, at first, a tenant by cow service, then a new soldier, performing duties which were afterwards committed to esquires. When the term bachelor was restricted to the candidate for knighthood, servants, in the capacity of armour bearers were appointed; hence the serjeant, serjeant at arms, from the Latin serviens:—

“Thus Harald and Lofwyn, that out of lond were dryven,
With grete oste of Ireland at Chestre up aryven.
Dorseth and Somerseth thei robbed and did wo
Of knyghtes and sergeantes thei slou thritti and mo.”‡

In the description of an army of the seventh or eighth century, the duty of attending the horseman and carrying their armour, is very appropriately assigned to skalks, servants:—

* Robert of Glouc. p. 30.

† Ben Jonson, The Magnetic Lady.

‡ Robert of Brunne, p. 59. The title occurs in the same sense in other places:—

‘And the erle Edrik he gadred mykelle pride
Knyghtes and Sergantes onn Lyndsay side.’

P. 46.

CHAP.
X.

“Tolf hundrud ge fek their manna tolf hundrud mara tolf hundrud skalka theirra er skiolld bera, &c.”*	Twelve hundred men I give to thee twelve hundred war steeds, twelve hundred servants, who shall carry their shields.
--	---

And in the poem of Birhtnoth, scealcas is a term somewhat contemptuously applied to the common soldiers of the Danish troops:—

“Tha hine heowon hæthene scealcas and begen tha beornas the him bigstodon.”	Then the Heathen scalks hewed him and the two nobles who supported him.
--	--

Line 358.

Shieldbearer, Serjeant.

22. In the Longobardic army, the office of shield-bearer appears to have become distinct: “Helmichius, qui regis schilpor, hoc est armiger, et collectaneus erat.”† Schilpor finds correlatives in the ancient terms schildknaphen and schildknechten, which are all more closely rendered by scutiger than armiger. From the fact that the shield-carriers of a horseman were originally servants and common soldiers—serjeants and skalks, it will be difficult, notwithstanding the pretences of heralds, to assign anything like nobility to the title of esquire, to which they give precedence over the simple gentleman, or believe that their degree was ever above that of a better class of servants, when considered independently of their station by birth, which, there is evidence of it in Jornandes, was often equal to that of their masters. Any man becomes truly an esquire by the circumstance of carrying a shield, which may belong to himself or another, and which may be the real piece of armour, or the picture of it in a coat of arms. Though particular offices and possessions, and situations at court, convey the title, they are not necessary to give the right to wear it. Three or four centuries back, gentlemen were wont to grant permission to others to use their coat of arms; and manuscript charters of this kind exist in the

* Hervarar Saga, c. 17, fo. 14 b.

† Paul Warnefrid, l. II, c. 28.

Harleian and perhaps other collections. The grantees became esquires, just as formerly the employment of carrying the shield of the superior procured them the same title. The former, in fact, is a mimic copy of the latter. Even those who held lands per scutagium, can be regarded in no other light than that of servants hired for the work, and receiving their wages in land. All disputes about the dignity of this title are idle, and unsupported by any facts connected with its origin. The serjeant of our old English army exactly corresponds in signification of name with the skalk, or servant, and in office with the esquire.* Each carried the shield and tended on the horse of his master. This title, as we have seen, is mentioned as early as Robert of Brunne, and in such a manner as to justify the inference that it was but another name for esquire:—

“And the erle Edrik he gadred mykelle pride
Knyghtes and sergantes onn Lyndsay side.”

Chron. p. 46.

“Anoiwe and Normandie alle holy he held,
Of Gascoyne the segnorie bowed unto his scheld.
Ilka knyght and squiere, clerkis to him suorn, &c.

P. 128.†

The name is a corruption of seruiens, a servant, by the suppression of the semi-vowel, and the office is that of the knight's servant.

Of Escuyer or esquire, Selden remarks that it is not “a name of the same notion as in ancient time. And yet the latter application of it proceeds from the antient. For heretofore the division of dignities was such that after that of gentry, this of esquire followed, and then bachelor, chevalier, banneret, and the rest, in which division, as bachelor denoted one in military service aspiring to knight-hood, so esquire signified one that was attendant, and had

* In old German, scal and scalch denoted servus, of high or low degree. Wachter derives the term from the verb scolon, scal, A.-Sax. sceal, our shall in its imperative sense, imposing a duty to be performed.

† See also note p. 345.

CHAP.
X.

his employment as a servant waiting on such as had the order of knighthood, in matters that conduced to arms, bearing their arms and helping them to horse, and such like." When the title of bachelor ceased to be used in this sense, that of esquire was given to gentlemen who were not knights, notwithstanding that the office denoted by the title was menial, and formerly, as before shown, executed by the skalkas, schalken or scealcas, that is, men of private rank in the army, but probably of a better condition than the common men. What Marcellinus and Procopius call shield-bearers, "scutarii," in the former, were these skalks carrying their superior's shield and attending to his horse.

GENTLE-
MAN.

23. An ambiguity in the English word gentle, which we use for both well born and well mannered, has occasioned a more general application of the word gentleman, than its etymology warrants. In strict propriety, it belongs to none who is not descended from one of the Germanic conquerors of the Roman provinces; and, by consequence, in England it should be restricted solely to the descendants of the Saxons, for the Normans were a band who invaded France nearly four centuries after the great distinction between the barbarian or gentile nations, and the Romans or subjugated had been made, and continued to the descendants of the two races. But, in another point of view, it is questionable whether even the descendants are entitled to the term gentleman, because it no where appears that the subjugators of Britannia adopted the distinction. In this case, gentleman must be regarded as an exotic title, and its precise signification is to be found, not in the circumstances of its origin, but in its subsequent history.

The following observations are made by Daines Barrington: "The statute 33 Edw. III., c. 22, 1360, relates to the claiming of a stray hawk, and directs that the sheriff shall proclaim it through all the principal towns, and keep it for four months; if no owner appears in that time, it becomes the property of the sheriff, provided he pay a sufficient satisfaction to the person who brought it: 'sil soit simples homme,' if he be a simple man; and if a gentleman, 'sil soit gentils homme,' claims it, after the four months are expired, the sheriff is to restore the hawk on payment of the charges of keeping it. This distinction used between simple homme and gentil homme, seems to explain the meaning of the word gentleman, which is used in so very vague a sense at present. I should conjecture that the simple homme, is John or Thomas, who hath no surname; and in contradistinction he who hath a surname or family name from the word gens, is styled gentleman."

Upon these passages are the following notes:—

"In an action brought upon this statute, the meaning of the word must be settled, as that of esquire must likewise be, in some of the game laws. The word gentilhomme, though at first applied to persons of the greatest rank and consequence, from its being afterwards indiscriminately used in addressing any one, became, by the time of Francis I. of France, almost a term of offence, as Brantome informs us, that his uncle Mons^r de la Chataignerage resented this appellation from the princess de la Roche sur Yon. On her complaining to the king of some expressions which Chataignerage had made use of, Francis I. said, she must thank herself for having addressed him so improperly (t. I, p. 375). Sir Thomas Smith, in his Commonwealth, distinguishes the English below the rank of esquire, into gentlemen, yeomen, and rascals (ch. 21, Lond. 1612, 4to.). In another place he uses the word rascality, in this sense.

"Surnames are of no great antiquity in this country, nor are many of the common people in Wales to this day, so distinguished. So Menage, in his Dictionary, informs us, that the peasants of Languedoc are called by their own christian name joined to that of their father, as Pierre de Guillaume. In the time of Henry I., when that king would have married an heiress of the great family of Fitzhamon to his base son Robert, she replied, in the verses of Robert of Gloucester,—

CHAP.
X.

It were to me a gret shame
To have a lord withouten his twa name.

Romance concerning Britain, p. 92.

“The word gens sometimes signifies family. Hicke, in his Dissertatio Epistolaris, observes, that neither William the Conqueror, nor William Rufus, had any nomen gentile, which he expresses his surprise at, because the ancient kings of the northern parts of Europe were so distinguished.”*

In the 14th century, gentillesse, gentility, denoted nobility. The son of Thomas Mowbray, the duke of Norfolk, who was beheaded in 1399, being fourteen years of age, petitioned the king in that year for an annual allowance from his father's estates, “pur apprendre honur et gentillesse.”† And in an English gloss of this age, “gentilitas” is rendered “paynemerye,” paganry, having manifest reference to the origin of the term in the distinction between the vanquisher of the Roman, and the vanquished. However, in the following century, the English word gentleman occurs for a man of noble family; thus Edward, duke of York, in 1405, writes to his followers in Wales, informing them that he has received letters from the Privy Seal, authorising him to borrow money to pay their arrears, and he solemnly assures them that he will not take any part of his rents in Yorkshire until they are satisfied, “and this y behote you on my trouthe and as y am a trewe gentil man.”‡

The importance of the title in the middle ages, may be shewn by many circumstances, but the case of Sir J. de Gomeney will be sufficient. This person having received sentence of death under Richard II., applied for a commutation, on which the mode of death was changed to decapitation, by letters patent, wherein the reasons are set forth

* Observations on Anc. Statutes, p. 288.

† Acts of Privy Council, 1 Hen. IV., 1399, vol. I. p. 100.

‡ Ib. p. 272.

at length. The chief of them was, that he was a gentleman and banneret, who had served the king's grandfather in his wars, and was not a subject of England."* "A gentleman condemned to death," says Segur, "was anciently not to be hanged, but beheaded, and his examination taken without torture."†

In the primary sense of gentleman, the king cannot create one; but as the king does create gentlemen, it appears that the word is not understood in any but a conventional sense. One John de Kingston was by patent received into the state of a gentleman, and created an esquire by Richard II.‡ Justice Norton, in the reign of Henry VI. said, "If a writ of doubt be brought against the serjeant of the kitchen in the king's household, I may write him cook, and my writ is good enough; and yet he hath a collar, and is a gentleman." Here he uses the word gentleman, applying it to those who were made esquire by the king's favour, because also they were by their creation put in the rank of the most eminent sort of gentlemen, on whom the title of esquire hath been since so fixed.§ This use of the two terms is altogether erroneous. The king's cooks, like those of other people, are menial servants, and their occupation is base. They may be serjeants and esquires, but not gentlemen, unless so born, in one modern sense of the word, or well educated and behaved in the other. In either case the title is irrespective of the occupation.

"The title of gentleman," says Selden, "(as we use it absolutely in common speech, when we attribute it to any man to whom it belongs in the largest acceptation in any of those countries,) denotes one that either, from the blood

* Et pur ceo q'estes gentil homme et baneret, et avetz servy au dit aiel en ses guerres, et n'estes liege homme nostre S'r le roi, vous serrez decolle sanz autre juyse avoir.—Rot. Parl. t. III. p. 451.

† B. IV. c. 16.

‡ Luy avons resceivez en l'estate de gentilehome et luy fait esquier.—1 Part. Pat. 13 R. II. m. 37.—Selden, p. 832.

§ Ib. p. 835.

CHAP.
X.

of his ancestors or the favour of his sovereign, or of them that have the power of sovereignty in them, or from his own virtue, employment or otherwise, according to the laws and customs of honor in the country we speak of, is ennobled, made gentile, or so raised to eminency above the multitude, perpetually inherent in his person, that by those laws and customs he be truly noblesse or noble, whether he have any of the precedent titles or not fixt besides on him.”*
Chaucer’s notion of a gentleman is that of a well-bred man :—

But who is so vertuous,
And in his part not outrageous,
Whan such on thou seest thee beforne,
Though he be not gentill borne,
Thou maiest well shine (this is in soth)
That he is gentyll, because he doth
As longeth to a gentilman.†

An older poet than Chaucer styles the Saxon earls, Sigefrid and Morcar, two old gentlemen, obviously using the term synonymously with nobleman :—

Tuo old gentillemen Idrik did forfare,
The ton hight Sigeferd, the tother Sir Morgare.‡

Whether gengylmen be an error for gentylmen, or a term of which the explanation is to be sought, I am not certain : it occurs thus :—

Gengylmen that he vond in prison ek ope
Other in warde myd unrygt he brogte hem onte also.

Robert of Gloucester, p. 323.

The lax application of the highest title of nobility, one that is entirely independent of office and its positive or adventitious profits, is of very recent date. No longer since than the seventeenth century, the assumption of it

* Selden, p. 852.

† Romaunt of the Rose, v. 126. Elsewhere he describes the essential qualities of a gentleman to virtue, justice, sobriety, piety and truth; and adds :

“ But ther may no man, as men wel se, Bequethe his eire his vertuous noblesse.”

‡ Robert of Brunne, p. 46.

was censured with severity, by an authority that appears to have been perfectly competent to enforce its penalties. The Quarterly Reviewer of Lord Nugent's "Memorials of Hampden," conveys in a striking manner, the estimation in which the designation of gentleman, when sustained by certain pretensions of birth and station, was upheld by the obsolete and tyrannical Court of Honour. "Its proceedings," he says, "were a grievance to the people not to be supported; 'the decrees of it,' says Bishop Hacket, 'were most uncertain, most arbitrary, most imperious; nor was there any seat of judgment in the land, wherein justice was brought to bed with such hard labour.' Justice might make out a case against the bishop for introducing her in such a manner into such a court. The mountain might have supplied a better metaphor. A citizen of London underwent its sentence for telling 'a well descended creditor,' who gave him hard words instead of discharging his bill, that he was no gentleman that would not pay his debts. Another party received its sentence for falsely saying, in way of defamation, that one Brown, who was of antient family, was descended from Brown the great pudding eater in Kent. Jack of the West, who had been an ostler and a famous wrestler in Lincoln's Inn Fields, set up for a gentleman, and took the arms of the Lord de la Warre's family. The Lord being an infant, his guardians brought the matter before the Court of Honour, where Jack's forged pedigree was disproved, and he was ordered to be degraded, never to rate himself as a gentleman any more, and to pay a fine of 500*l*. The grievances which grew out of this court, adds the Reviewer, constituted for such offences as this, must be ascribed to those who practised and presided in it, not to a system of tyrannical government."*

But it must also be ascribed to the higher value set upon such distinctions by society at large, for otherwise neither the court nor its judgments could have been tolerated,

* Quarterly Review, vol. xlvii, p. 484, 5.

CHAP.
X.

unless sustained by the kind of government, which the Reviewer denies, existed. The cases cited seem to prove that in those times, the word gentleman was understood in the sense of well-born; and if so, the judgments of the court, apart from its severe penalties, were just. In the modern acceptation of the term, it is just possible, that Jack, the ostler and wrestler, and Brown, the descendant of the pudding man, might not have reason to fear comparison with their aristocratical namesakes, with plebeian appellations.

Sir Walter Scott, in a short passage in his Guy Mannering, gives both the true sense of the term as now understood, and its vulgar misapplication: "Why this fellow ——" says young Hazlewood, "all the world knows him to be sordid, mean, tricking; and I suspect him to be worse. And you yourself, my dear sir, when did you call such a person a gentleman in your life before?"—"Why, Charles, I did not mean gentleman in the precise sense and meaning, and restricted and proper use, to which, no doubt, the phrase ought legitimately to be confined; but I meant to use it relatively, as marking something of that state, to which he has elevated and raised himself,—as designing, in short, a decent and wealthy and estimable sort of person."

However, if words were to be confined to their original signification, it would be doubtful whether any person living could lay claim to this title; for though some German and French pedigrees ascend sufficiently high to justify such a pretension; yet, from the legal necessity of divorces, and the frequent detection of falsities in genealogies, from neither of which the most illustrious families have escaped, few of these documents are free from reasonable suspicion. From the sexual frailty, which sometimes disturbs the purity of descent, and from which no family, imperial or servile, having notions of a descent of centuries, can, in the nature of things, be exempt, pedigrees are not the kind of evidence on which the philosophical historian would choose to place implicit reliance. Few have ever believed in remote and uncorrupted pedigrees. Gentleman took its second sense of well-born, which seems to be its use in the modern gentilhomme, from the circumstance that he at least bore coat-armour; but if that were its true meaning in England, we should be obliged to allow such ruffian stabbers as Lord Mohun to be gentlemen. In the third and prevalent sense, resulting from the secondary sense of the adjective gentle, it embraces any class of people, who are not engaged in mechanical or servile employments:

“Multa renascentur, quæ jam cecidere, cadentque,
Quæ nunc sunt in honore vocabula, si volet usus,
Quem penes arbitrium est, et jus, et norma loquendi.”

24. This title, whose etymology has occasioned great Valvasor. contrariety of opinion among professional writers, has already been shown to be an adaptation of the Sanskrit varivas, service, by the common change of an r to an l. The composition of the word (vara, to approve, wish for, and vas, to dwell, in the 4th class, or vas, to cover, in the second), seems to place the valvasor originally among household servants, and to denote one of the highest rank; but the circumstance that in Europe he was the tenant of a tenant in capite, may justify considering it in some respects as a title sui generis. As the etymology was unknown, the orthography was unsettled, and it appears as valvasor, vasvessor, vavasor, in antient works of equal authority. What is meant by it in one general sense is the vassal of a vassal, who holds of a prince; yet in old English the word is used for the latter:—

“Sir kyng Isakin, I am thy vavasoure,
My name is Statin, I will be no traitoure.”*

The title was unquestionably introduced by William I., who, in translating the law of Cnute respecting heregeats into French, renders the mid-thegn of the Danish law by varessur.† This fixes the precise rank, for the king’s

* Robert of Brunne, p. 166.

† De relief a vavassur, &c. c. 20; and Cnute’s Laws, De Hereotis, c. 72.

CHAP.
X.

thegns being equivalent to the great barons, or capitanei regni or regis, the mid-thegn is the less baron, who was called capitaneus medius. Yet, according to Spelman, if any of the capitanei regii granted any part of their feods to their vassals, the latter were called regii vel regis valvasores,* which agrees with the English Chronicle above.

Judge Blackstone observes that, “the first name of dignity next beneath a peer, was antiently that of vidames, vicedomini or valvasores; who are mentioned by our antient lawyers as viri magnæ dignitatis. Yet they are now quite out of use; and our legal antiquaries are not agreed upon their original or antient office.†

Vice-
domini, Vidames.

The vicedomini, in French, vidames, however, received their appellation from an office, which is not the subject of doubt. On the continent, they exercised a jurisdiction under the bishops, whose representatives they were, and thence took their titles. There was one vidame to each bishopric, in which he tried both civil and criminal causes, or la haulte justice, because the clergy were restrained by canon law from trials which were followed by the shedding of human blood. It is therefore doubtful whether the classification of the learned commentator be quite correct. Vidame is still in use in our Channel Islands.

That some office was denoted by the word vavasor is clear from the ancient law respecting general pleas or assizes, because after earls and bishops, several great officers are named with this title among them; thus ‘sheriffs, heretocks (commanders of the army), trehingreves (judges of thirds of counties), leidgreves (judges of leets), vicars, centeners or hundred men, aldermen, mayors, vavasors, tungreves, and landlords.’‡ Comparing the latter part of this enumeration, which regards officers of corporate towns with a modern list of such functionaries, the vavasors occupy the place allotted to the mayor’s assessors or councilmen,

* Gloss. p. 220.

† Comm. I, 403.

‡ Ll. Hen. I. c. 8

between their chief and the bailiff. In a charter of Henry II., 1166, quoted by Du Cange, the following titles appear in succession,—earls, barons, vavasors, knights, citizens, burgesses, and husbandmen (“rustici”). On the continent, at the same period, the term was used in opposition to noble: “Tam nobiles quam vavassores.”* Chaucer applies it to his franklin:—

“At sesiones was he lord and sire,
Full oft time he was knight of the shire;
An anlace and a gipsere all of silke
Hung at his girdle white as movwe of milke.
A sherife had he beene, and a coronour,
Was no where such a worthy vavasour.”†

Franklin.

Francalia, or franklands, were estates free from tribute and service, an. 1247; the tenants were called francalini, or free tenants, whence the French frauncleins, as it appears in Trivet, an. 1307. A feudum francale could not be alienated without the king's permission, but it no where is found that the vavasor was exempt from feudal service; yet no one can imagine that Chaucer has not employed the word in strict propriety. In still older English, the franklin of a town, was its lord; Robert of Brunne, in his account of the statute of Dead Hand or Mortmain, as it is now called, makes franklin correspond with seigneur de la terre:—

“Was mad an other statute that non erle ne baron
No other lorde stoute, ne fraunkelyn of town
Tille holi Kirke salle gyve tenement, rent no lond,

* Chart. an. 1157. Spon. Hist. Genev. II, p. 47.—Du Cange, VI, 1442.

† Mr. Richardson has the following illustrations of the word, among many others:—

For thaugh the fader be a fraunkelayne, and for a felon be hanged,
The heretage that the air sholde have ys at the kynges wille.

Piers Plouhman, p. 178.

England is so thick spread, and filled with rich and landed men, that there is scarce a small village, in which we may not find a squire or some substantial householder, commonly called a frankleyne; all men of considerable estates.—Fortescue, de laud. Legum Ang. by Gregor, c. 29.

CHAP.
X.

Fro tho that now lyve in to the dedis hond,
Without leve of the kyng or of hys counseale.”*

Part of the original, quoted by Hearne, is the following:—

“ Est fet lestatut, qe counte ne baroun
Ne seingnour de tere par my la regioun, &c.”

Among the French, in the thirteenth century, the vavasor was the vassal of a baron or count, to whom he owed service according to the statute of St. Louis:—‘No count nor other may give his liegeman or vassal, except to his brother or sister; but to them he may give him in part;† but he should not give him to a stranger, if he give him with all the obeissance or homage which he had, without retaining any. For if the baron gave him to one of his vavasors, it would to the damage of the vassal, for it would be necessary to render two obeissances, to him to whom he would owe it, and to the baron of whom he held his fee.’‡

As another term for homage appears, it may be permitted to remark that the French obeissance is derived from the Latin obedientia, and that the latter, both in name and thing, is a Roman form of the Sanskrit abhivadana, an obeissance, bow, or prostration before a person addressed by name.§

Whatever may be the signification of the word, or the office of the man, it is clear from the law of William I. that he was at least the thegn of a tun, and possessed a seat at the burhgate, the place of dispensing law and justice, besides the other requisites of a churl, who aspired to this rank; for there can be no doubt that the Mercian law,

* Robert of Brunne, p. 166.

† En partie, query by name, as de parte, in Middle Age Latin?

‡ Nus ne quens, ne bers, ne autres, ne puet donner son homme de foy, se n'est à son frere ou à sa suer; mes à iceus le puet il donner en partie, mes il ne le pourroit pas donner à un estrange, se il ne le donnoit à toute l'obeissance que il avoit sans riens retenir. Car se li bers le donnoit a un de ses vavasors, ce seroit au damage de celui; car il convendrait faire deux obeissances, à celui, à qui il la douroit, et au baron, de qui il tendroit son fié.—Du Cange, t. iv. c. 1207.

§ Amera Cosha, p. 176, v. 40.

regulating distinctions of society, relates to the middle thegns, or vavasors, and lords of towns :*—

CHAP.
X.

Opon the tother dai Edward thider cam
To prisons of ther pray alle that ever thei nam,
Were brought him bifore, thre erles, thre barons,
And mo be five score knyghtes and lordes of touns.†

In the laws of Ethelbert, we read of offences committed in the cyninges tun, and the eorles tun, by which are clearly intended the estate or manor of a king and an earl; and all over England there are places designated by a Saxon proper name in the genitive case, followed by the word ton, implying the estate of the person designated as burg, or borough, in the same situation denoted his castle or fortress. This tun or ton is found in Aquitania Mauritania, and signifies, not an inclosed place as usually explained, but the region, country, or tract, of the Moor. Its etymon is the Sanskrit tan, to spread or stretch out; and extensibility, not contraction, is the essential idea of tun and town.‡ The towns having names composed in this manner, may have been the estates of the mid-thegns, and Charlton, in Kent, appears to have been that of a ceorl, who had not attained the rank.

* ‘ And gif ceorl getheah, thæt he hæfde fullice fif hida agenes landes. cirican and kycenan. bell hus and burhgeat setl. and sunder note on cyninges healle. thonne wæs he thonon forth. thegnrihtes weorthe.’ And if a churl throve so that he had fully five hides of his own land, a church, and a kitchen, a bell-house, and a seat at the burgh gate, and a special duty in the king’s hall, he was thenceforth of thane right worthy.—sect. 2. The reason for a bell house and kitchen has been explained.

† Robert of Brunne, p. 277.

‡ As a general term, town, in English law, is taken to contain both boroughs and cities (Coke, 1 Inst. 115). This seems to have arisen from considering it a derivative to tynan, to shut. The difference between a town and borough, which were both collections of houses without a wall, seems to be that the latter had a burh or fortress in the centre or immediate neighbourhood, and so did not require a wall, while the former was without defence. In Luitprand, a burg is called “domorum congregatio quæ muro non clausa.”—L. III, c. 12, an. 932. If the Sanskrit puri, a city, be the etymon, burg, the castle, takes its name from the place.

CHAP.
X.

A vavator, holding his town of a great baron, corresponds with the Scottish Goodman, mentioned by Sir George Mackenzie.*

It has been shewn already that goodman was originally a military designation, equivalent to knight, though it may be of an inferior class; and it appears from this herald, that it is the same as vavator, although etymologically the latter implies a servant.†

Commoner

25. By a very gross error of long standing, and committed by heralds and even lawyers, all persons of landed property under the rank of baron, are called Commoners. The aristocracy of country, whether titled or untitled, cannot be common people; and the lords of the soil are the natural aristocracy. The term commoner admits but of two senses; the one is the member of a community, which includes both high and low; and the other is a member, an actual member of a commune, or division of community including the whole nation. In the latter sense, a burgess, whether he be a mayor or the town's crier, is a member of his commune or borough. But the term Commoner, as applied to an untitled gentleman, must depend upon the whole kingdom or a part, and in either case it is defective in the important quality of precision. It does not distinguish him without admitting a conventional acceptation, of which there is no notion conveyed by the word.

* Suprà, p. 315.

† Struvius has the following grades of vassals: the first chief or capitanei, whether dukes or princes, who held immediately of the king; the second, Valvasors, who held of dukes and princes; and the third, Valvasini, who held of the vavator.—Hist. Jur. Feud. p. 710, in Wachter. Conjectural etymology is never safe: Wachter explains vavator to be the servant of a servant, evidently in reference to the vassi. But the vassi were not servants in the sense of service as now understood. In the Capit. of Charles the Bald, they are everywhere joined in business of state with the great officers of the household, or the comites missi, and were therefore men of rank. Bouquet explains them to have been persons in the royal household. The derivation from the Celtic gwas, a servant, is puerile. If it be a Teutonic term, it is derived from the Sanskrit vas, to dwell, hence vasa, one residing in the house.

This last is the predicament in which commoner stands as the appellation of a class of the people. We have Commoners among commoners, but distinct from commoners whenever we speak of them as Commoners, which is nonsense, or a confusion of sense. We appear to mean by Commoner, as distinct from the other commoners, a person either a member of the House of Commons, or eligible to become one. In the latter case, we give him an application to which he is not yet entitled, and if we mean the former, the only sense in which it is admissible, we exclude all the gentry who are not members, and are guilty of a solecism, since commoner does not express our meaning. A member of the House of Commons is not a commoner, but a house-commoner or an elected commoner, supposing that the term house of commons is more correct than the house of communes, as it was anciently termed.

Commoner is marked in Bailey's Dictionary as a word of improper use, and defined "a member of the house of commons." In this sense a Commoner is one that represents the common people, otherwise the people of the commune, and is not so called because he is a common man; nevertheless, the term is not precise, because commoner means both a member of the house of commons and a common person. In the articles super Chartas, 28 Edw. I., "tout le commune d'Engleterre," signifies all the people of England; but commonalty is in general taken for the middle sort of the king's subjects, viz. such of the commons as are raised above the ordinary sort, and coming to have the management of offices; on which account they are only one degree below burgesses, who are superior to them in order and authority. The ordinary people and freeholders, or at best knights and gentlemen, under the degree of baron, have been called the commonalty or community of the kingdom.—See 2 Inst. 539.*

* Jacob, Law Dict.

CHAP.
X.

The statute of Westminster 1, 1275, runs thus:—The first general parliament held after the coronation—by the advice and assent of the archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, “et la comminalte de la terre illeokes somons.” Here the commonalty summoned to parliament can mean only those persons who were of the rank which entitled them to the writ of summons. There were, therefore, then, as now, commoners who were not common men, and, by force of the word, commoners who were common men.

The same absurdity is found in subsequent statutes and writs. In the statute 25 Edw. I., c. 6, (1297,) the commonalty of the land, after earls and barons, in parliament, means the knights, citizens, and burgesses,* who were commoners in respect of their communes, but being, therefore, above other untitled persons, could not be commoners or common men. Nearly the same words are found in the statute 7 Edw. II.† By other statutes we find these commoners termed great men, grandees: so runs the description of the parliament which passed the statute of sheriffs in 9 Edw. II., 1315, which states that it consisted of the “prelatz, contes, barons et autres grantz du roiaume somuns par nous.”

In 51 Edw. III., the commoners or grandees are analysed thus: “Chivalers des contes, citiens des citees, et burgeoys de burghs y venuz par somonce de ce parlement;” and subsequently, that we may not mistake their generic term, they are styled “les dites communes.”‡ Afterwards the members of the house of commons are termed the people, and the peers are called grandees, “de touz les

* “—As autres gentz de seinte eglise, e as cuntes e barons e a tote la communaute de la terre.”

† Graunte per nous et per ercevesques et abbees priours countes e barouns et toute la comunalte de nostre roialme illeokes a nostre mandement assemblez.”

‡ Rot. Parl. t. II, p. 373.

grandz de sone royaume et de son poeple.”* A person who may be styled by the term which does not degrade a nobleman, cannot be a commoner in the true sense of the word, and yet nothing is more ordinary than to call the English gentry commoners, although they may not have the right of sitting among the representatives of the communes. Blackstone says, “The commonalty, like the nobility, are divided into several degrees; and as the lords, though different in rank, are all of them peers in respect of their nobility, so the commoners, though some are greatly superior, yet all are in law peers.”† It may answer the purpose to call the nobility peers, because the latter may be taken as a synonyme of noblemen, but it is a confusion of rank and order to style those who are above the common people, by a term which denotes the “rascality.” Such appears to have been the opinion of Sir Thomas Elyot, who was employed on several embassies by Henry III., for he makes a just discrimination. “Plebs in English is called the communalty, which signifieth onely the multitude, wherein be conteined the base and vulgar inhabitants, not advaunced to any honour or dignitie: which is also used in our daily communications, for in the citie of London and other cities, they that be none aldermen or sheriffs, be called communers. And in the countrey, at a sessions or other assembly, if no gentyl men be ther at, the saying is, that ther was none but the communalte, which proveth in myne opinion, that plebs in Latine is in English communalty, and Plebeij be communers. And consequently ther may appeare like diversitie to be in English between a public weale and a common weale, as should be in Latine between Res Publica and Res Plebeia. And after that signification, if there shall be a common weale, eyther the communers onlie wealthy and the gentyl and

* Acts of Privy Council, 13 Rich. II., 1389, vol. I, p. 14.

† Comm. I, 12.

CHAP.
X.

noble men needie and miserable, or else excludyng gentylitie, all men must be of one degre and sort, and a new name provided.”*

Sir William Segar, a professional writer on ranks and nobility, finds seven divisions of the people comprised under the term Commoners :—

1. The first are husbandmen, whose endeavour is employed about the fruits of the earth.

2. Artificers, occupied in arts either necessary, honest, or pleasing.

3. Victuallers, retailers of wares and chapmen.

4. Mariners and sea souldiers.

5. Fishermen.

6. Watermen and ferrymen.

7. Masons, and labourers in stone.

8. Workmen of little substance, and labourers.

9. Bondmen and slaves.

“Look, as you blow this feather from my face,
And as the air blows it me again,
Such is the lightness of your common men.”

* Boke named the Governor, fo. 1 b, and 2, 12mo. Lond. 1580. In the edition by Mr. A. T. Eliot, Newcastle, 1834, the language is modernized, and we read the words, “and no gentyll men,” meaning beyond all question gentlemen absurdly put, “and no genteel men.”

CHAPTER XI.

Conclusion.

1.—Derivative Titles ; Banneret. 2.—Baronet.

Thus far, nothing has been said of those appellations of rank which may be properly denominated derivative titles, with the exception of damoiseil, donzello, and one or two others similar ; for Viscount and Vidame are not derivative but inferior dignities. There are, however, only two omissions, which any person can supply without assistance. These are banneret, which manifestly belongs to the class of bannerherren or bannerlords, and baronet, which, being a modern invention sufficiently explained under its principal, requires no elucidation.

CHAP.
XI.

1. With respect to the former, which, from the circumstances of its creation, was truly the highest mark of personal honor that could be conferred in those rude ages when bravery in the field was esteemed the noblest virtue, there is but little to say. The name imports the bearer of a small banner, and, in this respect, he differed from the baron, who bore a gonfanon or banner of war,* and the simple knight, who bore a penon. The banner, properly so called, was a square flag ; the penon, according to the illuminations of ancient manuscripts, was a small square, having two long triangles attached to the side opposite that which was fixed to the lance or spear. These pendant portions resembling tails, were so denominated. Rastal defines a banneret to be a knight made upon the field of battle, with Banneret.

* See p. 285.

CHAP.
XI.

the ceremony of cutting off the point of his standard, and so making this a like banner. And such, he says, are allowed to display their arms on a banner in the king's army, like the barons.*

That was, no doubt, the mode of creation; but it appears from what was said of Knights Bachelors,† that a knight, or an esquire of four bacelles, or cow lands, and therefore, a bachelor, to whom the king had presented a banner on his first battle, became a banneret on the second; so that, in such cases, there would be no such ceremony necessary. From documents of the year 1485, belonging to the convent of the three orders in Bretagne, which Du Cange drew from the archives of the Chateau de Nannet, we find them called banerers ("banerii,"), placed next to barons, and in precedence of bachelors, lords (seigneurs de la terre?) knights, and other noblemen.‡ This estimation of his rank, shows that the banneret occupied the very same place that an act of the legislature assigns to the modern rank of baronet in England.

A manuscript by Dr. Kuerden, preserved in the library of Chetham Hospital, in Manchester, gives the following account of the knight banneret: "This knight was to appear in the army having his banner. He shall be led betwixt two other knightes, before the king or generall, bearing his penon of armes in his owne hand, in the presence of the nobility and other captaines. Then the herald shall say to the king or general: 'May it please your grace to understande that this gentleman hath showed himself in the field, and for so doing deserveth to be advanced to the degree of a knight banneret, as worthy from hence forth to bear it in the war.' Then the king shall cause the points of his penon or guydon to be rent, and the new made banneret shall go to his tent betweene two other knights, the trompets sounding all the way before him, there to receive (sic, sed qu. pay?), fees, videl. to the herald 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, or, if before, he were a knight bachellor, then to pay also to the trumpets 20*s.* Then might at least 25 knights attend on him. The banneret and every estate above him may beare his banner displayed, if he be a captain and set his armes thereon."* This is not only curious, as not mentioned elsewhere respecting the practice in England, but, as far as such matter goes, it is valuable, since it comes from competent authority. Dr. Kuerden was the assistant or deputy of Sir William Dugdale, for the visitations of the northern counties.

* "Banneret est un chivaler fait en le campe ove le ceremony del amputer le point de son standart; et feasant ceo si comme un baron. Et tiels sont allouves pur display leur armes en un banner en le army le roy, comme barons font."—Termes de la Ley, sub voc.

† Suprà, p. 340.

‡ "Ad quod concilium celebrandum omnes et singuli episcopi, abbates, &c., comites, barones, banerii, baccalarii, domini milites et alii nobiles."—Gloss. I, col. 976.

Du Cange quotes an old manuscript of ceremonies, whence, among other things, we learn that another title was banderet. The Romans, it appears from passages cited by him, called their semeion, in the time of Procopius, a bandon, and bearer of it bandophoros; and Paul Warnefrid uses bandum as their term for vexillum.† Now vexillum is that which is carried, and band, in Persic, the original of this bandum, is fascia; so that most probably this bandon or bandum, a term which they might have learned in Greece, was not truly a banner, but the ordinary ensign of the legions, unless, indeed, through affectation of foreign terms, they really did apply it to the imperial eagle.

The passage from the ceremonial, which must be considered as applying to the banneret, is still more curious than Dr. Kuerden's account, and is to this effect: 'When a knight has served long, and followed the wars, and when he possesses so much land that he can keep fifty men of

* Kuerden MS. 4to. fo. 337.

† "Vexillum, quod bandum appellant, abstulit."—De Reb. Longob. l. I, c. 20.—Suprà, p. 286, n.

CHAP.
XI.

quality (gentils hommes), to accompany his banner, he may lawfully raise his banner, and not otherwise: for no other person may bear banner in battle, if he have not fifty men-at-arms (hommes d'armes), and the archers and cross bow-men (*abalestriers), who appertain to them; and if he has them, he should carry a penon with his arms in his first battle, and go to the constable or the marshals to request that he may be made a banderet, and if they grant his request, they must cause the trumpets to sound, and cut off the tail of his penon, and then he should raise and carry it with the others below the barons.' The reason of this practice Du Cange thinks is, that it was considered more noble to bear a banner than a penon; but as every full banner or standard denoted a country or feod, were it a dukedom or a free barony, may not the penon, with its tails, have been originally a full banner, from which the lord, on presenting a vassal with a portion of his own feod, to be held of him in chief, a triangular portion was cut in token of diminution? In other words, while the full banner denoted a large or baronial possessor, did not the penon, in like, represent the knight's fee?†

Baronet.

2. One approaches with reluctance the modern title of baronet, for as to the "baronet," in the statute of Richard II., it is so clearly a clerical error for banneret, as to call for no remark.‡ Grammatically, the term is clear enough; it is the diminutive of baron; but baron is emphatically a man, the liege vassal of the king; and baronet, therefore, etymologically would seem to imply a doubt. Degrees of honor admit of no diminution; a damoisel and a donzello are grammatical diminutives, but they do not lessen the rank of the bearer; for, on the contrary, they denote the heir to the larger honor, being attributed to none but the sons of the prince or nobleman, who bore the paramount title. They did not degrade, even in their etymological signification, which baronet appears to do, and no act of parliament can remove this radical defect. He is the "eques sine equo," with this difference, that the eques may have had or may obtain the horse necessary to justify his designation; but the baronet has an unfortunate excess in his title, of which he cannot divest himself, but which weakens honourable import.

* Should we not read arbalestriers?

† For the use of the banner at investment with a fief, See p. 284.

‡ Soit il erchevesque, evesque, abbé, prior, duc, counte, baron, baronet, chevalier de counté, cittizien de citté, &c.—St. Ric. II. an. 5.

Independently of these considerations, the title arose from the expedient of a needy monarch to raise money, and was offered for sale. Any man, provided he were of good birth, might, "for a consideration," canton his family shield with the red hand of Ulster. In this respect, it differs considerably from the title of knight, which was also given at one time of our history upon an estimate of money; but then the possession of the income contemplated by the state,* made it compulsory upon the party to pay so much to the treasury or become a knight. And this, so far from being deemed a desirable honor, was regarded as a serious hardship.

The observations and suggestions of Sir James Lawrence, a knight of Malta, are very judicious. This gentleman says: "The title of Baron, which may be purchased on the continent for a hundred pounds, is too insignificant for any class of the peerage; but if a new made Baron be in the opinion of foreigners, si peu de chose, what must they think of a Baronet or little baron? As to the red hand on his carriage, no more attention is paid to it on the continent, than would be paid to a red foot or a red nose. The foreign herald mistakes it for a mark of cadetcy or of a

* Temp. Hen. III.; those who were possessed of an estate of 15*l.* were summoned ad militiæ dignitatem; temp. Edw. I., it was 20*l.*; temp. Edw. II. 25*l.*; and afterwards 40*l.* Refusal subjected the party to a fine, from the time of 41 Henry III. See Spelm. Gloss. p. 218, and the quotation from Barrington, p. 334, 5.

CHAP.
XI.

younger branch, and conceives that it is rather a diminution than an augmentation. A coronet and supporters would not disparage the shield of Sir Egerton Brydges, though consisting of three hundred and sixty Princely, Royal, and Imperial quarterings; but the red hand only disfigures the simplicity of his ancient paternal coat.

“Well then, let the title of Baronet, together with his red hand, cease to exist. Let the Dukes remain as they are; add the Earls to the present Marquisses, and give the title of Earl, or rather of Count, to the present Viscounts and Barons. And let these three classes—Dukes, Marquisses, and Counts—compose the House of Peers or high nobility.”*

The latter portion of the suggestion, however, cannot be tolerated: an English earl can never be confounded with the foreign count, who may either be an actual or only a titular count. The titular counts are the sons of the actual counts, and are consequently very numerous. It is, therefore, a title which conveys no idea of dignified rank, and is besides too widely diffused. If the baronet become a baron, he will necessarily become a lord and a peer; and since, according to Sir James Lawrence, he is not to sit in parliament, the change would revive the distinction between lords of parliament and simple lords, or great and less barons.

Difficulties of this kind are readily surmounted. If it be objectionable to detach the title baron from the lords of parliament, and as the diminishing term baronet ought to be extinguished, the whole object of raising an order of men above the common knight and below the baron, would be accomplished at once by leaving the title Sir untouched, and granting supporters, and legalizing the term hereditary knight, or something equivalent, to denote the perpetuity of the honor in the family of the person so distinguished.

* On the Nobility of the British Gentry, 4th Edit. p. 112.

These, however, are matters that can concern none but the nobility and the persons who bear the designation of baronet; and with respect to any alterations of the existing titles of the peerage, it may be doubted whether a legislative act will be powerful enough to raise them higher in the estimation of the people. The immense number of titles which have been granted since the accession of George III., by ministers, anxious for parliamentary majorities, has considerably tended to tarnish the lustre of the British nobility. “Les titres et les dignités ne sont plus un but aujourd’hui; ils ne sont qu’un moyen. On ne plus depute pour defendre les interêts du son pays.” The small number of historical families who remain, however, may possibly cover the great blemish, occasioned by political corruption in rewarding political subserviency with the honors, that, conferred on the meritorious, derive a splendour from them, which no monarch can impart to either.

APPENDIX.

RIGS MAL.

An allegorical account of the origin of ranks and titles, composed in the 7th or 8th century.

Dr. Jamieson translated the above title of this ancient poem, The Song of King Eric. It is frequently cited in the glossary to Sæmundar Edda, under the title of Rigs thula, the Speech of Eric. The following account of him is given by the Doctor, in his Illustrations of Northern Antiquities :—

APPEND.
Rigs Mal.

“ RIG (the rich), or Eric the Second, who ruled in Scandinavia about the end of the second century, is the hero of the following piece, which is supposed to be a production of the seventh or eighth century. He is said to be the first of the Goths in Scandinavia, who assumed the denomination of king, his predecessors having been called Diar or Drottnar, that is, chiefs and lords. He is likewise the first who divided his subjects in three distinct classes, of nobles, husbandmen, and slaves, distinguishing precisely the right and privileges of each; and upon this foundation the following allegorical poem was constructed. The fiction is exceedingly simple, being no more than a personification of the different orders of society, and making them the chil-

APPEND. Rigs Mal. dren of king Rig. But this simplicity in the design, and the plain and unambitious manner in which the story is told, constitute the principal excellence of the piece, which is certainly, so far as it goes, one of the most curious and interesting 'manners-painting strains' that have been preserved, not excepting the Odyssey of Homer. On this account it is deserving of much more attention in a historical point of view, than it has hitherto met with, as it gives us in a few short lines a complete picture of the manners, dress, education, pursuits, and habits of life of our northern forefathers, upwards of a thousand years ago. Of the fidelity of the outline, there can be no doubt, as the skald (if he deserves that name), has painted from nature, and gives us the manners of his own time; and the baldness of the execution is the best warranty for the accuracy of his delineations. Those who are acquainted with the present condition of the lower class of Scottish Highlanders, will be surprised to find their out-of-door and fire-side scenes so minutely described by a Scandinavian poet of the seventh or eighth century.

"The following copy is no more than a reprint of that which was edited at the University of Lund, in Sweden, in 1801, by Emanuel Wenster. It was only a college exercise; but the imprimatur of the learned president, Professor Sjöbery (to whom I am indebted for my copy), is sufficient security for its accuracy."—Illustrations, p. 444.

Scandinavian history or fable represents Danur as first assuming the title of king, and he is said to have reigned 1040 years before the Christian era.—(Ynglinga Saga, cap. 20.) Sperling makes the first king to be Rikr, in 258, and this appears to be the monarch whom Jamieson calls Eric; but it does not follow that he should also be the Rig of the poem, who is plainly stated to be one of the Asir or Gods of Scandinavia, namely, Heimdaller, a son of Odin, who called himself Rig. Whether it be an allegory of the distribution of society, by king Rikr, into three classes, or an allegory of the progress of society from a savage to a civilized state, under divine superintendence, and the gradual rise of nobler ranks, may admit of dispute. APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

The poem is transcribed exactly as it is printed by Jamieson, without correction of any of the errors.

Svo segia men i fornum sögum ad ein hver af Asum, sá er Heimdallr hiet, fór ferdar sínar oc fram med siáfar ströndu nöckri oc nefnedist Rigr. Efter saugu theirri er kvædi thetta.

I.

Ar quadu ganga
grænar brautir
aflgann oc alsæminn
As kunnigann
romann oc roskvan
Rig stiganda.

II.

Geck hann meir at that midrar brautar
kom hann at húsi
hurð var á gætti inn vann ad ganga
elldr á gólfi.

III.

Híon sátu þar
haud af eárne
Ai oc Edda
Alldin fallda.

IV.

Rigr kunni theim
rad at segia meir settizt hann
midra fletia
enn á hlid hvara
hión salkynna.

V.

Thá tok Edda

Men relate in ancient histories that one of the Asir or Gods who is called Heimdall, went on a journey, and coming to a certain sea coast, named himself Rigr (or Eric). According to the story, he sang as follows:—

I.

Of yore, 'tis said, there went,
along green ways,
the deeply skilled Asian,
powerful and honored,
robust and adult,—
Eric proceeding.

II.

He continued his course
along the mid road;
and came to a house,
whose door was ajar:
straight stept he within,
where a fire blazed on the floor.*

III.

A couple sat there,
hardened by labour,
Goodman and Goody,† in ancient garbs.

IV.

Eric was able
to give them advice,
and he set himself down,
on the middle of a bench,
and on each side were
the folk of the house.

V.

Then Goody took up ‡

* "In pavimento ignis." As in some huts in the Scottish Highlands, the smoke passing through a hole in the roof.

† Proavus et proava. Ai and Edda are the Sanskrit ayus, age, and adi, the beginning. The meaning of Edda has been deemed obscure.

‡ Description of the condition of men in the lowest order of society.

APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

okunn leif
thúngann oc thyckvann thrunginn sádum.

VI.

Bar hon meir at that midra skutla sod var i bolla
sette á biód
var kalfr sódinn
krása beztr.

VII.

Reis hann upp thadan
reidzt at sofna
Rigr kunni theim
rád at segia
meir lagdizt hann midrar reckiu
en á hlid hvara
hion salkynna.

VIII.

Thar var hann at that thriar nættr saman
geck hann meir at that midrar brautar
lidu meir at that mánudir nió.

IX.

Jód ól Edda
jósu vatni
hörvi svartann heitu Thræl
han nam at vaxa
oc vel at dafna.

an uncouth loaf,*
heavy and thick,
and full of bran.

VI.

Afterwards she bore it,
to the middle of the table,
where was broth in a pot,
and she placed on the board
a boiled calf in a dish, of dainties the choicest.

VII.

Thence he rose up,
ready to sleep :
Eric was able
counsel to give them ;
so laid himself down
on the middle of the bed,
and on each side were
the folk of the house.

VIII.

There was he afterwards
three nights together.
He went forth again
along the mid road.
There elapsed after that
a space of nine months.

IX.

A son Goody bore,
whom they sprinkled with water,
and the swarthy of skin
they named Thrall.†
He took to growing,
and to do well.

* "Conspersum cinere panem."—"Nam in cinere et prunis coctus fuit." Though the Swedish editor may be right in his comment, the word okunn is unknown, strange, uncouth; and the writer means either that it was so to Ríg, or would be, if seen, when the poem was written.

† The custom of sprinkling with water, or dipping in it, the child on giving it a name, is a very ancient Oriental rite or practice. The Swedish editor notices that it prevailed among the Scandinavians before their conversion to christianity, as in fact this poem is evidence of it; and he refers to Ragnar Lodhroks Saga, p. 15; Suhm. l. c. p. 243, 279; Lagerbring, l. c. p. 446.

X.

War thar a höndum hrockin skinni kropner knúar fingur digrir
fulligt andlit lotr hrigr
lagir hælur.

XI.

Nam han meir at that magns um kosta
bast ad binda byrdar giörva bar han heim ad that hris giörstann dag.

XII.

Thar kom ad gardi gengilbeina or var á ilium
arma sólbrunninn
nidrbiugt var nef
oc nefndizt Thye.

XIII.

Midra fletia
meir settizt hon
sat hiá henni sonr huss ræddu oc ryndu
reckiu giördu Thræll oc Thye
thrúngin dægr

XIV.

Bauru ólu thau
biuggu oc undu
hygg ec heti
Hreimr oc Fösner
Klur oc Klöggr
Kefser Fulner
Drottr oc Digralldi

X.

There was on his hands,
a rough furrowed skin ;
with bandy knees,
clumsy fingers,
misshapen features,
a crooked back,
and protruding heels.

XI.

He began then
his strength to employ,
bast to entwine,
bavins to make,
and bore he home then
wood every day.

XII.

There came to the village
a gangrel-legged lass ;
with sweat on her feet,
arms sunbrowned ;
down-hooked was her nose,
and she was named Thew.*

XIII.

On the middle of the bench
she sat herself down :
and near her there sate
the son of the house :
they talked and considered,
and made their bed,
did Thrall and Thew,
on busy days.

XIV.

Children they had ;†
they embraced them and loved ;
I remember they called them
Cold-endurer and Herdsman,
Clown and Grumbler,
Troubler and Stuffer,
Slow-foot and Fatchops,

* Thye, a female worker or labourer.

† It is not easy to find English equivalents for the proper names, which throughout the piece are intended to convey an idea of the general kind of individuals comprised in each order. Here, for instance, the occupations, characters, or personal qualities of working men are indicated.

APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

Drumbr oc Hösnir
Lutr Leggialdi.

XV.

Lögðu garda akra toddu unnu at svinum geita gættu
oc grofu torf.

XVI.

Dæter voro thær
Dumba oc Kumba
Oek Kvinkalfa
oc Arinn-nefia
Ysia oc Ambatt
Eikin-tiasna
Törtrug Yppia
oc Trönubenia
thadan eru komnar
Thræla ættir.

XVII.

Geck Rigr at that midrar brautir
kom han at húsi
hurd var á gætti inn nam at ganga
elldr var á gólfi
hion sato thar
helldu á syslu.

XVIII.

Madr telgdi thar
meid til rifiar
var skegg skapat
skaur var fyrri enni
skyrtu thröngva
smockr á halsi.

XIX.

Sat thar hona oc sveigdi rock breide fadm bió til vadar
sveigr var á höfði
smockr var á bringu
duckr var á halsi
dvergar á oxlum
Afi oc Amma
attu hús.

Bumpkin and Growler, Humpy and Trickster.

XV.

They laid down hedges and fields manured ;
they tended their swine ;
they guarded their goats,
and they dug up turf.

XVI.

The daughters were these,
Misty and Blowzy,
Thick calves and shanks,
and Pug nose :
Forward and Servant,
Bound-with-wood ;
Clumsy and Leaky and Timber-legs :
from these are come
The race of the Thralls.

XVIII.

Further went Eric
along the mid road :
he came to a house,
whose door was ajar :
stepped he in straight,
and found the fire on the floor ;
a couple sat there
who held to their work.

XVIII.

The good man was cutting wood for a spindle ;
his beard was in order,
and straight combed was his hair ;
a narrow skirted
smock hung from his neck.

XIX.

There sat the good wife,
and whirled her rock,
with arms extended,
intent on a gown ;
her hair was tied up,
o'er her bosom a smock,
a shawl on her neck,
buckled over her shoulders.
Grandfather and Grandmother kept the house.

XX.

Rigr kunni theim
rad ad seggia reis frá bordi
red at sofna meir lagdist hann
midrar reckiu
en á hlið hvara
hión salkynna.

XXI.

Thar var hann at that thriar nættur saman
lidu meir at that mánudir nio
jód ól Amma
jósu vatni kölludu Karl kona sveip ripti raudann oc riodann riduda rauda.

XXII.

Han nam at vaxa
oc vel at dafna
öxn nam at temia
ardr at giörva
hús at timbra
hladur at smida
karta at giörfa
oc keyra plog.

XXIII.

Heim óku tha hángin-luklu
geita-hyrtlu
oc giptu Karli Snör heitir su
settizt undir ripti.

XXIV.

Biuggu hión oc bauga deildu breiddu blæiur
oc bú giördu baurn ólu thau
biuggu oc vndu.

XXV.

Heit Halr oc Drengr
Hauldr Thegn Smidr

XX.

Eric was able
to give them advice,
and arose from the table,
ready to sleep.
He lay down then
in the middle of the bed,
and on each side were
the couple of the house.

XXI.

There he resided
three nights together.
After there had passed
nine lunar months,
a son Grandmother bore ;
they sprinkled him with water,
and called him Charles.
The good wife in a wrapper inclosed the red-haired and ruddy cheeked lad with piercing eyes.

XXII.

He took to growing
and to do well,
oxen he began to tame,
roofs to make,
houses to build,
granaries to form,
carts to construct,
and the plough to drive.

XXIII.

To his home there drove in a car
a maiden called Spinster, with keys at her side,
and goat skin kirtle,
who married Charles,
and sat under the cloth.

XXIV.

The couple embraced and rings exchanged ;
blankets they spread and chamber prepared ;
children they had
whom they fondled and loved.

XXV.

These were Freeman and Braveman
Hold, Thane, and Smith,

APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

Breidr Bondi
Bundin-skeggi
Bui oc Boddi
Brattskeggr oc Seggr.

XXVI.

Enn hetu svo
audrum nöfnum
Snot Brudr Svanni
Svarri oc Sprakki
Flíod Sprund oc Víf
Feima Ristill
thadan eru komnar
Karla ættir.

XXVII.

Geck Rigr thadan
rettar brautir
kom han at sal
sudr horfdu dyr
var hurd hnigin
hringr var í gætti.

XXVIII.

Geck hann in at that Gólf var stráad
sátu hion
sáz í auga
Fadir oc Modir
fingrum at leika

XXIX.

Sat hús gumi oc snerre streing
alm of bendi örvar skepti
enn hus kona
hugdi at örmum
strauk of ripti strekti ermar.

XXX.

Keiste falld
ringa var á bringu
sidar slædur
fer bláfáan

Broadshoulders and Bonde,
Bound-up-beard,
Tiller and Farmer,
Shortbeard and Swordsman.

XXVI.

The girls were called thus by other names :
Prudence, Wife, and Swanlike,
Imperious and Prattler,
Bland, Sprightly, and Maid,
Modesty and Lady.
From these are come
the races of the Churls.

XXVII.

Eric went thence along a straight road ;
he came to a hall,
to the south looked the doors,*
the gate was down (closed)
with a ring in the door.

XXVIII.

Then he went in,— the floor was spread over with straw ;
there sate the couple,
Father and Mother,
in each other's eye gazing,
with their fingers at play.

XXIX.

There sate the husband,
and twisted strings,
an elm-bow he bent
and arrows shaped :
but the housewife
attended to her labour,
smoothed her linen,
and straightened sleeves.

XXX.

Choice was her robe,
a ring o'er her waist,† her clothes low down
of blue colour, she wore ;

* The entrances of houses, tombs, and temples, had generally this aspect.

† “Hoc loco ornamentum quoddam lunatum indicat, simile forsan fibulis pectoralibus puellarum nostrarum Scanensium.”

brun biertare briost liosare hals hvitari
hreinni miöllu.

XXXI.

Rigr kunni theim
rad at seggia
meir settizt hann
midra fletia
en à hlid hvara
hión salkynna.

XXXII.

Tha tok Modir
merkta dúk
hvitann af hörvi
oc huldi biód
hon tók at that hleifa thunna hveita af hveiti oc huldi duk.

XXXIII.

Framsetti hon
fulla skutla
silfri varda á biód fan oc fleski
fugla skeita vin var i könnu vardir kálkar
drucku oc dæmdu
dagr var á sinnum
Rigr kunni theim
rád at segia.

XXXIV.

Reis Rigr at that reckiu giördi
thar var hann at that thriar nætr saman
geck hann meir at that midrar brautar
lidu meir at that manudir nio.

XXXV.

Svein öl Modir
silki vafdi
jósu vatni
Jarl letu heita

her countenance was brighter, her breast more shining,
her neck whiter,
than pure snow just fallen.

XXXI.

Eric could to them
counsel say ;
so he sat down
on the middle of the bench, and on each side
the household pair.

XXXII.

Then took Mother
an embroidered cloth,
white, and of linen,
and covered the table :
she took after that delicate cakes,
white, and of wheat,
and covered the cloth.

XXXIII.

Forth she placed on the table full dishes, with silver mounted ;
beans and bacon,
fowls spitted (i. e. roasted) ;
wine was in their can,
their cups were mounted ;
they drank and conversed
till the day was passing.
Eric was able
to give them advice.

XXXIV.

Eric rose then
and made his bed.
There he resided
three nights together.
Afterwards he went on the middle of the road ;
there elapsed after that lunar months nine.

XXXV.

A boy Mother bore ;
in silk enwrapped him ;
they sprinkled him with water,
and Jarl had him called ;

APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

bleikt var hár
enn biartar vangar
ötul voru auga
sem i yrmlingi.

XXXVI.

Upp óx thar
Jarl á fletium lind nam at skelfa
leggja á streingi
alm at beygia
örvar at skepta
fleini att fleygia
fröckur at dyia
hestum rida
hundum verpa sverdum bregda
sund at fremia.

XXXVII.

Kom thar at ranni
Rigr gangandi
Rigr gangandi
runar kenndi sitt gaf heiti son kvedzt eiga

XXXVIII.

Thann bad hann eignatz
ódal völlu
ódal völlu
oc alldnar bygdir.

XXXIX.

Reid hann meir thadan
myrkvann veg
heilug fiöll
unz at höllo kom
skapt nam at dyia
lind skelfdi hesti hleypti oc hiörvi brá.

XL.

Vig nam at vekia
völl nam at riöda val nam at fella
va til landa.

XLI.

Red hann einn at that atian búvm

fair was his haír,
and bright his cheeks ;
sparkling his eyes,
as those in a serpent.

XXXVI.

Up grew there,
Jarl in the dwellings,
linden arms shaking,
shafts to string fitting,
bow of elm bending, swift arrows shaping,
javelin darting,
lances casting,
horses riding,
dogs training,
swords brandishing,
rivers swimming.

XXXVII.

There came to the mansion,
Eric fast walking,
Eric fast walking :
who taught him runes,
and gave him his promise,
and said he would own him his son.

XXXVIII.

Then bade him be possessed of hereditary plains,
hereditary plains,
and ancient villages.

XXXIX.

Thence Jarl rode forth,
on a darksome way,
to the sleety fells,
till he came to his hall ;
the spear he began to hold,
linden weapons he shook ;
mounted his horse,
and brandished his sword.

XL.

He began to raise war,
to redden the plains,
slaughter to spread,
and lands to invade

XLI.

Afterwards he alone ruled eighteen villages :

APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

aud nam skipta öllum veita
meidma oc mösma
mara svangrifia hringum hreytti
hió sundr bang.

XLII.

Oku mærir
vrgar brautir
komu at höllu
thar ed Hersir bió
mætti han miófin garde hvitri oc hoskvi hetu Erna.

XLIII.

Badu hennar
ok heim óku giptu Jarli
gek hun vnd line
saman biuggu thau
oc ser undu
ættir jóku
oc alldrs nutu.

XLIV.

Bur var hinn ellzti
enn barn annat
Jod oc Adal
Arfi Mogr
Nidar oc Nidiungr
namu leika
Sonr oc Sveinn
sund oc tafl

his riches he distributed, giving to all
treasure and presents,
steeds stately and sleek ;
rings he divided,*
and bracelets in sunder hewed.

XLII.

Great men drove along miry roads,
and came to the hall,
where the Baron dwelt.
A maiden met them,
of slender form,
fair and graceful,
named Eagle.

XLIII.

They made suit for her,
and drove her home,
and in marriage gave her to Jarl.
and she went under the nuptial pall.
Together they lived,
and loved each other :
their family increased,
and life they enjoyed.

XLIV.

Bur was the eldest,† and other children were these,
Child and Noble,
Heir and Sturdy,
Son and Nephew,
Youth and Kinsman who took sport
in swimming and chess.

* Many of these massive rings are preserved in the North. They were used as money, and paid or given whole or in parts. Some had smaller rings attached to them. Hence a common expression was to cut a ring, equivalent to paying so much money :—

“Hear thou now, gude ferryman,
Thou row me o’er the Sound,
And I’ll gie thee my gude ring,
It weighs well fiftene pound.”

Translation of an old Danish Ballad, by Dr. Jamieson.

† Bur, a son, and a proper name of Odin.

APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

Kundr het einn
Konr var hinn yngsti.

XLV.

Upp óxu thar
Jarli bornir
hesta tömdu hlifar bendu skeyti skofa skelfdu askr.

XLVI.

Enn Konr vngr
kunni runar æfinn runar
oc alldr runar meir kunni hann mönnum biarga eggjar deyfa
elldi at lægia.

XLVII.

Klök nam fugla
kyrra elda sæva oc svefia
sorgir lægia
afl hafdi oc eliunn
atta manna.

XLVIII.

Hann vid Ríg Jarl
runar deildi brögdum beitti oc betr kunni
þá ödladist oc
þá eiga gat Rígr at heita rúnar kunna.

XLIV.

Reid Konr vngr
kiörr oc skóga

One was called First born, and Cousin the youngest.*

XLV.

Up they grew there
the children of Jarl, horses they broke in,
bowed shields formed,
sheaths they scooped,
and trees overthrew.

XLVI.

But the young cousin knew his runes,
ancient runes,
and the runes of his time.†
He knew how besides,
men to protect and aid,
edged weapons to blunt,
and fires to extinguish.‡

XLVII.

Fowls' language he knew,
could stay conflagrations, and waves restrain—
sorrows assuage,
and the strength and daring
he had of eight men.

XLVIII.

Eric with the Jarl
his learning divided,
in doctrine disputing,
and better he knew :
then riches acquired, and thus it fell out that he was named Rich,§ being skilled in runes.

XLIV.

Young Konur rode to the lakes and forests ;

* Konr is sometimes a nobleman.

† The different kinds of runes, the knowledge of which constituted the learning of the time, may be found in Brunhilda's Quida, in Volsunga Saga. Some were supposed to have magical properties, and were used for incantations, talismans, &c.

‡ He could act on occasion like one of our firemen.

§ Powerful ; Suprà, p. 179, &c.

APPEND.

Rigs Mal.

kolfi fleigdi kyrði fugla
þa quad that kraka ein sat quisti à.

L.

Hvat skalltu Konr vngr
kyrra fugla
helldr mættu thier
hestum rida
oc her fella.

LI.

As Danr oc Dampr
dyrrar hallir
ædri ódal en thier hafit their kunno vel
kiöl at rida egg at kienna vndir riúfa.

arrows he shot,
and birds he tamed.
Then sang the solitary crow sitting on a bough.

L.

Why must thou, young Konur tame birds?
Rather mightest thou chargers ride
and the host strike down.

LI.

Swede or Dane, or *Danpur has precious halls and other (i. e. better) heirlooms than thou, and they know well how
in ships to sail,
edged weapons to use,
and gashes to make.

* The empire of Denmark, when it consisted of Denmark proper, and West Gothland.

ADDITIONAL NOTES.

APPEND. Page 10. The particular or technical sense of the term. This passage is incorrect. It should have had terms, in the plural, and continued thus, "under investigation, when they became appropriated to any peculiar purpose of designation."

— 14. "The staple words of a tongue are traced to the strange languages of remote, and it may have been, unknown people." The observations of Verelius in claiming for Gothic terms a Gothic parentage, deserve attention:—"Origo feudorum a Barbaris est, puta Gothis, Vandalis, Longobardis, &c. qui barbaria sua nobiles nil Græce, nil Latine, norunt. Non igitur credibile est, ut ipsi patriis suis muneribus exoticas quærerent appellationes, duras præsertim et insolitas, cum vel ipsas quidem notissimas non admitterent. Quis enim non videt, eos sic admiratos esse suæ gentis vocabula, ut proscriptis Græcorum Romanorumque illis, hæc (cum jugo simul) utrique imperio et omnibus Europæ populis imposuerint.—Ind. Scytho-Scand. p. 287. The terms gentilis and barbarus are remarkable exceptions if they were understood in a Roman sense; but the great probability is, that the Northern nations mistook them for marks of honour. See p. 92.

— 17. "As it invariable in all cases," &c. read: As it is said to be invariable in all cases, &c. The Reviewer of Jäkel says: "This law is undoubtedly strict in the earliest languages (one reason why we apply to them only), but relaxed somewhat in course of time." I have met with some exceptions in the early languages.

— 20. Scarcely altered in orthography. That is, with the exception of the regular mutations which occur in transition, and which are the foundation of Grimm's canon and Professor Pott's Etymologische Lautvergleichungstafel (I. p. 82) showing the changes of each Sanskrit consonant as it passes into Latin, Greek, Lithuanian, Gothic, Old High German and Persic. The alteration in orthography, therefore, does not disguise the word, but the latter becomes difficult and doubtful if a real or irregular variation take place.

— 20. The family of Gautama or Jutama reminds us of the Gothones. Torfæus concludes Odin to have entered Scandinavia 500 years before Christ, which is the period of the last Buddha or Mahavira. Odin's successor was Gotama, and Gotama was the successor of the last Buddha or Mahavira, who as Gotama or Gaudama is still adored from the straits of APPEND. Malacca to the Caspian Sea.—Col. Tod, Annals of Rajasthan, I, p. 64. There was another Odin contemporary with Krishna, about 1000 years before Christ. To this the mythological legends belong.

P. 20. Who appears to Danur. Who appears to be Danur.

— 26. The Gothic D constantly answers to the classical T in the cognate words. In the canon, the Gothic D answers to Greek Th; but the Latin has no such aspirate, and a T takes its place. Hence, A.-Sax. aldor is truly Lat. altor, as stated; hence too aldi, aldii, aldiones, &c. cannot be Latin words, though they have Latin forms.

— 27, n. Alviss appears to be an importation of the Sage (not Saye,) Alavala. In the old way of analysing words, alviss is all-viss, all wise, omniscient; and it may be right. But in the transmission of proper names into Northern mythology, there have been greater metamorphoses than are observed in the liberties which the Greeks took with foreign appellations. I cannot but think that the Indian name is the foundation of Alviss. Alavala is a basin round the foot of a tree to support it with water.

— 31. Save tribes of southern Africa. M. Kolben, speaking of the Hottentots, says: "One horrid custom remains to be particularized. When persons of either sex become superannuated, or, in short, unable to perform the least office for themselves, they are then, by the consent of the kraal, placed in a solitary hut, at a considerable distance, with a small stock of provisions within their reach; where they are left to die of hunger, or be devoured by the wild beasts. Cruel as this custom is, they consider it as an act of mercy; and are filled with astonishment when they hear it reprobated by Europeans. It must, however, be confessed, that they never practice this dreadful desertion of the aged, till life is absolutely a burden. While the old are capable of any act of humanity, they are treated with the tenderest attention, and care is taken to relieve the burden of their years."

— Mavor's Collection of Voyages, Vol. IV. p. 41.

— 34. Al, also alam, be able. Read "Al (also alam, able,) to be able." It seems better to explain the roots as if they were infinitives, for the addition of the grammatical sign convey no additional import to one who is not acquainted with the language, while the neglect of it in English, causes either a mistake or an obscurity.

— 42. Thiude, the people, should be thiuda, the people. The Sanskrit patimat, governing, might be added to these words. The termination mat, is an attributive of possession, and the whole seems to have primarily signified the possession of the means of sustaining the people.

— 44. The Romakas, (erroneously Romaikas,) are mentioned before p. 20. See Asiatic Researches, v. III, p. 349, &c.

— 45. Fedest, in Anglo-Saxon, is better illustrated by the Icelandic fædsla, food, nourishment, than veitsla, a feast; but the latter became a forensic term in the feudal and fiscal laws of the north.

— 46. Gras t'hacoor, &c. Read, "composed of gras and t'hacoor, where gras is literally a mouthful, and the whole grasya t'hacoor is the APPEND. consumer of a mouthful." Not adverting to the different modes prevailing among different authors, of representing Oriental sounds by European characters, this translation is probably wrong; the coor, or khōr, is a common termination to denote an eater. If the first syllable be a corrupt contraction of dhā:ka, an ox, food, &c., the title may not unlikely have reference in its present application to the hide of land (See Chursa, p. 47), which in so many countries denotes a certain measure, and thus while the literal meaning of the grasya t'hacoor is a mouthful of ox, the applied term denotes the enjoyer of a portion of land granted out of a larger estate.

P. 46. We see a like principle of nomenclature. The general appellation Asiatic, from Asia, seems to denote the eater. Sanskrit as or aç, r. g. comedere, and asana or açana, who eats.

— 47. Feudum. Stiernhielm employs these words: "Et hinc decantatum illud feudum, bona, sc. quæ sunt data till födum, h. e. in alimentum: de cujus vocis etymo Andabatarum more digladiantur linguæ Scandicæ imperiti interpretes legum Longobardicarum." This learned jurist looks upon it to be a Scandinavian word, introduced into the southern parts of Europe by the Longobards. The Swedish phrase, cited above, till or til födum, besides literally signifying for aliment, is the very word in question, foedum, feodum, feudum.

— 50. Emphyteusis appears twice instead of emphyteusis. The entire passage relating to this suggested etymon of feudum is too long for extraction, though it merits attention.

— 51. Lön, in Swedish. The Swedish is la°n, and it is merely the etymological equivalent of the English loan, but it strictly answers to the A.-S. lean, a stipend, which is the original of loan. The A.-S. ea=oa Engl., and a° Sw. The Swedish signifies wages.

— 58. They applied the same principle to land. It is an Asiatic principle: "In the east, especially in Rajasthan, the king has no title to the soil, nor any right whatever over the land beyond the revenue which accrues from it. In our feudal system, however, it was an essential principle that the king was the universal lord, and the original proprietor of all the land in the kingdom, which was derived from him and held of him (Tod, 32). What relates to our feudal system can be understood only in the two last of its three stages, when it abounded with corruptions, introduced by the clerical lawyers from the civil law.

— 62. Arascides. Read Arsacides.

— 72. Maharana. Read Maharaja.

— 92. Received the appellation of Barbarian in an honourable sense. Selden, who however held the opinion that the German and other northern invaders of the Roman provinces, borrowed Latin words to express their own ideas, observes, that these people, "in framing their words out of Latin, so esteemed the word gentilis, by which they found themselves styled in the Latin, that they made use of it in their own language as a distinction or note of honor for such of them as were of the more eminent quality, or in truth, nobiles, and were, it seems, ambitious to be honoured by the very name which the Romans had used in scorn of them. And that especially, because all being in those parts, after the irruptions of those nations, either Gentiles or Romani, the Romans (if you consider them as subjects of the empire), were generally in a far worse condition, in regard of subjection, tribute, and the like, than any subjects that were not as slaves to the better sort among other nations. And therefore the better sort of those nations, to express their liberty perhaps, which was dearest to them, and so much differed from that of the Romans, were also the forwarder to use that very word, which so properly distinguished them from the Romans. To this purpose, 'Hinc nimirum fluxit,' saith the learned M. Velserus (Rer. Aug. Vindelic. l. viii.), 'quod cum Barbari in devictis provinciis meliori quam Romani jure uterentur—gentilitatis nomen dignitatis existimationem induxerit, paullatimque eo res prolapsa sit ut Gentiles homines absolute pro Nobilibus dicerentur, quæ in Italia et Gallia, item Hispania et Britannia quodammodo ad hoc ævi tenet, atque, ut ineptias inanium opinionum rideas, si quem ibi Gentilem compelles, honori deputet; si, quod idem est, Barbarum, insignitam sibi illatam contumeliam opinetur.'—Titles of Honor, p. 862.

P. 111. Another word meaning man in the sense of warrior was introduced to the north of Europe. This should be south. The Longobards might indeed introduce ber, or fir; but the Saxons had wer, and the Germans bar or bær before their arrival.

— 121. Wachter supposes drost to have been drottsæt. He is not confirmed by the French drossart, a grand bailiff, which is Frankish properly, and literally a kind of governor.

— 122. Druerie. To this class of words belongs the Low Latin drudi, "Sine solatio et comitatu Drudorum atque Vassorum, &c."—Capit. Car. Calvi, tit. xxiii, c. 4.

— 126. Bell-house. The reference to this should have been L. Merc., and not L. Merr. The second article of the Mercian Law, on ranks, is given in a note, p. 358.

— 126. Tinel du Roy. "La Court de Seneschalle et Mareschall del hostiell du Roy ne la jurisdiction dycelle ne passe lespace de douze lewes a counters le Tenell du Roi."—St. 13 Rich. II. st. 1, c. 3. The lewes or miles were to be counted from the house or palace.

— 127. The Anglo-Saxon met, meat, in the sense of feodum, resembles the Dutch (or Low Saxon, as Bellenden calls it), miet, a stipend; as "mij hoor miet!" I have a right to my dues, namely, the stipend of a priest. —Archæology of Popular Phrases and Nursery Rhymes, Vol. I, p. 258, and p. 287.

— 142. The etymological cognate is bellare. The word whence come the Low Latin fello, and corruptly felo, is O. Germ. The following derivations are taken from Dr. Noah Webster's Dictionary, 1831, and Mr. (now Dr.) Richardson's Etymological Dictionary, 1836.

FELON.—Fr. felon, Low Lat. felo, Arm. fellon, It. fello or fellone, a thief. I accord with Spelman in deducing this word from the root of fail, the APPEND. original signification being a vassal who failed in his fidelity or allegiance to his lord, and committed an offence, by which he forfeited his feud. Hence, in French, felon is traiterous, rebellious. So the word is explained and deduced in Gregoire's Armoric Dictionary. The derivation fee and lon, in Spelman, copied by Blackstone, is unnatural.

Dr. Webster.

FELON.—Skinner says, either from the A.-S. felle, Fr. fellon, It. fellone, crudelis, cruel, fell, or from feah, beneficium, stipendium, and Germ. lon, pretium (sc.), the crime that is punished by loss or forfeiture of the fee. Hickes (Gram. Franco-Theo. p. 95), is of the former opinion, and Spelman favours the latter. According to Hickes, the forfeiture of the fee was an incidental punishment, adjudged to the felness, cruelty, or atrociousness of the crime. According to Spelman, this forfeiture was the cause of the imposition of the name upon the crime so punished. Vossius (de Vitiis, p. 202,) proposes the German faelen, vel feelen, errare relinquere, cadere. This etymology is noticed by Spelman, and rejected by Wachter, quia non explet mensuran criminis. The common usage among our old writers, as well as among the French, confirms this opinion of Hickes.

Dr. Richardson.

P. 171. Rajna, a queen, should be rajni.

— 177. The derivation of drott, dryhten, &c. may not be correct, for these terms may after all be the Sanskrit dhriti, a firm person, which with rita (see rector), is found as the proper name of an allegorical descendant of kuni, a prince so called, whence, it may be, come the various cognates of konungr, cyning, king (See p. 194). Drott, dryhten, and the cognates will, in this case, still belong to the class of titles denoting personal ability to protect.

— 180. The derivation of raja, rex, from ragh, may not be correct. Pott deduces rex from regere, and raja from raj, to shine, or to be splendid. His observations under the Sanskrit roots ranj (tingere), and raj (splendere), are as follows: "S. RAJAN (rex), des Glanzes, der grossen Pracht wegen. Hiemit scheint sich das Lat. reg sehr nahe zu berühren; gleichwohl leite ich dieses, wie jedermann, von rad. reg (richten, lenken), indem ich die Möglichkeit des Quantitätwechsels durch reg-ula, wie teg-ula von teg, beweise. Ich halte daher die Uebereinstimmung von RAJ-AN und reg, Goth. reiks (princeps).—Etymol. Forschung. I, p. 237. The Sanskrit raji, a collection, applied to people, is a society.

— 184. The Copy of Amera Cosha (not Costra, as in the note), is that of Colebrooke.

— 185. The loftiest titles in Europe have an exceedingly humble origin. In the reflections which M. Arnaud makes on the manner in which the Roman history is written, he has the following just remarks on the kings of Rome and their subjects: "Quels étoient les prétendus rois de ce ramas de quelques brigands? N'étoient-ils pas visiblement des chefs de voleurs qui partageoient un gouvernement tumultueux avec une petite horde féroce et indisciplinée?"

“Ne doit on pas, quand on compile l’histoire ancienne, faire sentir l’énorme différence de ces capitaines de bandits avec de véritables rois d’une nation puissante ?”—Variétés Littéraires, t. iv, p. 246.

P. 188. “Does not appear to have been known.” We can scarcely suppose a leader, even of the banditti in the preceding note, without some authority, and however limited it might be, he would still be all that Sir Francis requires for a king. His etymology, from can or cean, the head, and secondarily, the chief, does not convey more than the derivation of the Roman rex, from the Hebrew rosch, head. With respect to the early chiefs as legislators, Dicæneus, among the Goths, is particularly mentioned as governing by his own laws; and the first acts attributed to Odin, are making laws and appointing administrators of justice throughout Scandinavia.

— 197. The Judges of hundreds. These judges, called hunnonnes, are mentioned in a charter of the emperor Henry III, in 1056, and in another of Henry IV., in 1065: “Constituimus etiam atque jubemus, ut advocata in abbatia illa non nisi ter in anno placitare debeant, et illi qui hunnonnes in quibusdam locis dicuntur, tertium tantum anno, nisi recens furtum fuerit, aut ex parte abbatis facta fuerint, placitum habeant.”—Du Cange, III, col. 1260.

— 200. Gramur, an epithet of king. From the Sanskrit grama, a village, mentioned in the note, the word gramur affords another of the numerous appellations of men from the act of eating or supplying others with food. Grama is derived by the Hindu grammarians from gras, to eat, to devour.

— 209. Fra, fru, vrouw. On the general correspondence of Sanskrit P with Goth. F, O.H.G. V (See Pott, Etymol. Forsch. t. 82), I have suggested prabhuh, a master, as the etymon; but on reconsideration, I do not think that mistress, but that wife, is the first signification, and lady the second. In this case, it is either a derivative or a cognate of bharyya, a wife, and woman of the second order of nobility; from bhri, to support, nourish, maintain. Against this there is the general agreement of bh with b in Gothic, and p in O. H. German.

— 214. Nothing more than (of) a noble family. Æthel, variously spelled in the dialects, by itself, means native country; but in this word ætheling, it is manifestly in the sense of Norse ættar, affinity by blood, connected with Goth. atta, a father. The meaning of -ing has been sufficiently explained; but it may be mentioned that Wachter conceives that it is the Keltic engi, to bear children, to be born, and so to mean indigenous in Gentile names; as Thuringi, from mountains; Marsingi, from lakes; Talingi, from dales, etc. The termination, however, is not constant to this derivation, for he says that in dwellings, districts, cities, regions, it signifies earth, by anastrophe of γῆ. This latter opinion he tries to support by Ottfried’s heim-inge, the land of the virgin’s dwelling:—

“Thia muater ouh bibringe zi iro heiminge.”

L. 1, c. 21, v. 9.

APPEND.

Thy mother also brings thee back into the land of her dwelling.

Ottfried, restricted by the laws of metre, used the nearest word that would suit the original. His heim is a home, and his inge is that which is, not exactly a home, but partakes of the nature of a home, namely, a dwelling place in a larger sense than a house. (See the Sanskrit -in, which explains -ing in both cases, as well as the Keltic engi, p. 170.) Ham, heim (home), he explains to be a natural covering and ordinary shelter, from the Scythian (?) heimen, to cover; as A.-S. cildhama, the womb. I suspect that, originating when men were in the hunting and pastoral state, it was the place in which meals were taken. Sanskrit jhim, jam, cham, jim, chham, to eat. Helm, in the Teutonic dialects, in all its varieties, is a covering, and appears to be connected with Sanskrit r. chil, to clothe.

Page 215. Reguli and sub-reguli. A very ancient title of a nobleman in office among the Chinese is regolo, and Mewar, rawul. It is, therefore, not quite certain that regul-us is the diminutive of rex. Rex is rakshi, and rege, raja; and between regulus and these eastern appellations there is little difference. Col. Tod says, "Rawul or Raoul is yet borne as a princely title by the Aharya prince of Dongurpoor, and the Yadu prince of Jessulmer, whose ancestors long ruled in the heart of Scythia. Raoul seems to have been titular to the Scandinavian chiefs of Scythian origin. The invader of Normandy was Raoul corrupted to Rollon or Rollo." (Rajasthan, I, p. 213.) In Norse Saga, this Raoul is Hrollaugur. In the popular language of the Carnatic, raya is a king, whence rawul, regolo, &c.

— 220. The opinion that the sons of the kings of England were earls by birth, may be a reminiscence of the Anglo-Saxon policy, may also be owing to the practice of William I., for though Neustria appears to have been ceded to the Norse Jarl Hrollaugur or Rollo, as a dukedom; nevertheless William I., of England, "in his Saxon style of Normandy, called himself only earl of it, which in that age was translated princeps Normanniæ. But he used that name for those that were then the comites of England. And comes and dux were used indifferently in Normandy. From that age the Latin word comes, and the Danish earl, has expressed the same thing."—(Selden, Titles of Honor, p. 610.) If William's immediate successors of the Norman Line adopted the Saxon style, they must have employed the same word eorl, because heretoga, though in sense and etymology exercitus dux, did not admit the Continental acceptation of the sovereign dux. No diplomas of the kind seem to exist of an earlier date than 42 Hen. III., when duke had acquired the quasi regal signification. This monarch, in a singular proclamation, issued A. D. 1258, styles himself, "Henr' thurg godes fultume king on Engeloande. lhoaverd on Yrloand. duk on Norm'. on Aquitain. and eorl on Aniou."—Pat. I, 3 Hen. III., m. 15 in Turr. Lond. apud Rymer, Fœdera, t. I, p. 378.

— 220. Earls of Socburn were gentlemen of the same class. I suspect that gentlemen who obtained this title by popular acclamation, were descendents from persons who had received writs of summons to parliament before the distinction of minor and greater barons arose. The lords of the manor of Warrington were long styled barons, because one or two of the Butler family had been so summoned. There was the baron of Kinderton, so recently as the Parliamentary wars; and I think there is a baron of Hilton at the present day. Selden says: "The word baro hath also been so much communicated that not only all lords of manors have been from ancient time, and are at this day, sometimes called barons (as in the style of their Court Barons, which is Curia Baronis, &c., and I have read hors de son Barony in a bar to an avowry for hors de son fee), but also the judges of the exchequer have it."—Titles of Honor, p. 688.

P. 228. Transpose gefera, a companion, in order to make gerefa. Sir F. Palgrave seems to adopt their opinion (Engl. Const. I, p. 81, n.). Lye is fully persuaded of the truth of this singular fancy: "GEREFA, comes, socius, præpositus, præfectus: hinc vox recentior greve, graf (graphio), reve, cum compositis—tandem vero, quocumque demum occurrat hæc vox gerefa, nihil aliud sonat quam gefera, comes, cujus locum per metathesin occupat:" to which Wachter adds, "Atque sive gefera dicas, sive per anagramma gerefa, semper comitem dicis, socium, atque sodalem."

— 229. Of all these words, the low English grabber is the undoubted cognate. When this was written I had not seen Lassen's note on the word "durgribho," in the hymn of Atreya, on the God Agni or Fire, from the Rigveda. It appears that the root grah, to take, seize, apprehend, to which I refer gerefa, graff, and the like appellations of a fiscal officer, was anciently grabh (pronounced grav), as in the compound above, consequently grahaka, a police officer, was grabhaka, and graha, a receiver, grabha. Lassen cites as cognates the Gr. gripeus, gripeuo, griphos; Zendic gerew, part. gerepta; "et nisi fallor Latinum rapere."—Anthol. Sscrita. p. 136.

— 236. Bellagines. These were the civil laws of Dicæneus, a philosopher among the ancient Goths: "Dicæneus Gothis physicam tradens," says Jornandes, "naturaliter propriis legibus vivere fecit, quas usque nunc conscriptis bellagines nuncupant."

— 240. The bhala is the sign manual of the Saloombra chieftain, as hereditary premier of the state of Mewar. Pott derives bajulus (p. 241), from the Sanskrit wah, vehere, to carry.—Etymol. Forschung. II, p. 276.

— 244. Castrum. The following is Prof. Pott's derivation of this word: "Castrum etwa vom cadere (sich niederlassens) und castrare von cædere."—Ib. II, p. 256. It seems more probably derived from the materials of the building.

— 277. Hærgravius, found by Loccenius in the Chron. Asiat. It should be Ansiat., a Chronicle of the Anse or Hanse Towns.

— 279. Marquis, which is considered (p. 279–281) to be derived from mark, a boundary, and so to denote the lord or governor of the boundary, is conjectured by Pott to be the same as the Bas Breton marc'heh, a cavalier, from marc'h, a horse; as Gaelic marcach, a horseman, from marc, a horse. These words, as well as the old Keltic marca, Welsh març (a APPEND. horse, stud, stallion), Old High German merikha, a mare, and perhaps the Hungarian marha, a cow, appear to be referable to the Sanskrit mriga, a deer, or any wild beast (Ibid. II, p. 116). As the Sanskrit mriga comes from the root mrig, 1. 4. to search for, and mrig, in infinit. margitum, appears to be etymologically related to the root of mark; the immediate derivation of marquis and mark, a boundary, is not affected. As to the A.-S. meor, it seems clearly descended from Sanskrit mar, and to have been originally rather an epithet than the name of the animal. It may be further observed that the derivation of marquis, from this name of a horse, although it is referable to the same original as mark, a frontier, boundary, does not agree with the history of the word. The first marchiones were the guardians or governors of marches: "Carolus misit et accersivit filium suum bene equitatem, cum omni populo militari, relictis tantum Marchionibus, qui fines regni tuentes, si forte ingruerent, hostium arcerent incursus."—Aimon. l. V, c. 2. The first marquis among the Franks was Gero Marchio, who held the Saxon frontier against the Slavonians, in 950.

P. 280. Ban, or lord governor. "Ban turris et Hungariis præses aliqujus regni. Proprie tamen Ungaris, banni sunt peculiares gubernatores regnorum, ad Ungariæ coronam spectantium, ut Dalmatiæ, Croatiæ vel Sclavoniæ."—Spelm. Gloss. p. 62.

Ban, a banner, hence ban-leuca, a district round cities, towns, monasteries, &c., endowed with certain privileges; and bannum, bannire, are from the Saxon ban, an edict. In German, königs bann was a superior jurisdiction by the king's authority; burgbann, a municipal, and bhutbann a criminal jurisdiction. The original meaning is perceptible in all these terms.

— 281, n. "Marha, Marha," quod est apud eos signum bellicum exclamavit. Mar is the war shout of the Rajpoot warrior, when he invokes Har, the god of war. The word mar signifies the evil striker; and Har or Hara is the name of Siva, the destroyer of the world, from hri, to seize by force.

The explanation of mar is Col. Tod's; but may it not have been originally the same as the Scythian marha, which, however, might mean "to horse!" A.-S. meorh.

— 298. Admiral. Though Commodore is unquestionably a feudal title, it may be disputed with good reason, that the Admiral has any pretensions to be so considered. It followed rather as an appendant to the English conversion of a Spanish feudal title to a naval use, just as admiral superseded capitaneus maris. Matt. Paris, sub anno 1272, however, makes it equivalent to consul; and consul it is well known was an early translation of earl, and synonymous with comes. "Admiralius Jopensis, natione Saracenus; quæ dignitas apud nos consulatus vocatur."—Vide Spelm. Gloss. p. 12.

— 317. The Sanskrit praudah, proud, appears to be connected with the root prid. The d of praudah is a cerebral th, for which we have no character, and which represents a sound that is not found in any European language. As it is manifestly passed into the European d, praudah is given as the sufficing orthography of prauthah. Used for protha, it is a compound of pra and utha, the participle of vah, vehere, and signifies carried along or forward. APPEND.

— 319. Heri. Hara, a name of Siva, should have been introduced instead of Heri.

— 325 Baron, in the Laws of William I. Sir Henry Spelman says the word baron, was introduced into England by the Norman—"vel cum Edwardus Confessor aures moresque imbibisset Normannicos." The first mention of the word which I have met with, is in Domesday VII, 367, where it is said: "hanc terran invadiavit abbas et barones regis." And Eadmerus, who lived in the time of Henry I., speaking of William I., says: "Nulli episcoporum permittebat ut aliquem de baronibus suis, seu ministris excommunicaret."—Cruise, on Dignities, I, 51.

— 337. Low Latin caballus. It is Low Latin only in its signification, which in the middle ages had ascended from the sorry jade or nag of Horace, to the military charger. I doubt the derivation from kap, and refer to note, p. 340.

— 340. Signifying the proprietor of this cow land. There are many fanciful derivations of the Latin baccalaureus; as from bacca lauri, because successful candidates were crowned with laurel; from baculo, a cudgel, because boys were cudgelled to compel them to study. Others suppose the word to have been batalarii, because they battled or contended for mastery in learning. Wachter suggests A.-S. boc, a book, and lareow, which, however, does not mean a student, but a preceptor.

— 363. A term which denotes the "rascality." The term commoner includes gentlemen descended from old baronial families in the time of Henry III., of whom a few are still extant, and who possess a nobility which monarchs cannot confer, or truly speaking, exalt. After these come such as Wake, Blount, Clavering, Malet, Astley, Gresley, Beaumont, Corbet; and a few more equally ancient, though only of knightly rank in those days; such as Barrington, Clifton, Egerton, Burdett, Croft, Dering, Mordaunt, Bedingfield, Oglander, Tyrrel, Kynaston, Knightley, &c. "Many of these," says the collector of the names, "are in possession of fair estates, and retain their stations in society with honor." Families of this kind, vying with the titled nobles, and sometimes excelling them in the chief attribute of nobility, are degraded by the unsuitable appellation.

GLOSSARIAL INDEX.

- ABATIS, Low L. (? from abactor), an avenor, officer of the stable; modern hostler; duty of the arch-marshal of Germany, 293.
- Ad, Sskt. r., to eat, the etymon of atta, ataman, &c., 28. See adaling, etheling, adal land, ödal land, udal succession.
- Adaling, Teut. of a noble father or family, 169.
- Adal land, see ödal land.
- Adeling, 169, 170, 173.
- Adelingus, Low L. in the Barbaric codes put for patricius, with which it coincides in etymol. signification, 94. See ad and pa.
- Adelschalk, O. G. a noble servant, page in a ducal court, see edelknab.
- Adolescens Bohemicus, Lat. the Bohemian Youth, title of the heir apparent to the throne, 327.
- Admiral, see amirom.
- Ætterbot, O. N. compensation to a family for homicide, 102, n.
- Age, Old, held in little esteem among rude nations, 30; old people exposed to wild beasts, 31 n.; less likely to be venerated by the early Romans than the Germans, 40; treatment by the Hottentots, Addit. Notes to p. 31 n. See Youth.
- Ajax, a name primarily denoting strength, 301.
- Al, Sskt. r. to be able; its derivatives, 26, 27, 34.
- Ala, N. to feed, nourish, produce; its cognates, 26.
- Alam, Sskt. able, 34.
- Alaud, Belg. O. G. aliment, 35. See alod.
- Alauda, Lat. a Gallo-Belgic appellation of a Roman legion, 34.
- Alaud-is, -um, Low Lat. the same as alodum.
- ALAVALA, an Indian Sage, the same as ALVISS, 27 n.
- Alberga, Low Lat. certain right of free entertainment in the house of a vassal, 125. See herberg.
- Alberge, O. Fr. idem; and house of public entertainment? ib.
- Aldania, Low Lat. belonging to an aldea, 34.

- Aldea, Sp. a village, 33.
- Alderman (of London), anciently a "baro, caput tribuum," and "baro civitatis Londinensis," 217
- Aldii, Low Lat.; the nourished or maintained; cognate of Lat. alti: an inferior class of people, 27
- Aldiones, offspring of the preceding, 27, 28 n.
- Ald-dom, Aldom, A.-S. old age, 33. See Aldordom.
- Aldor, A.-S. answers to the English an elder, 25; cognate of the Lat. altor, a nourisher, 26; etymology of these words, 26, 27; used as the synonyme of king, 182.
- ALDOR, an Anglo-Saxon title of a chief, 25, &c.; a king or rex, 178.
- Aldoras, plu. of Aldor: maintainers, chiefs of the people; the satrapæ of Beda, 28; the altherrin or princes of the ancient High Germans, 29: the principes of Tacitus, 52, 169; attended by bands of young kinsmen, 54; enacted the first laws of Kent, 26, 29; their degree or quantity of power, 137; their title used as equivalent to king, 194; the same among the Sakasens as patres among the Romans, ch. III, 37.
- Aldorman, A.-S. aldor and man, chief of a tribe, after the Heptarchy, 28; became synonymous with heretoga, 214.
- Aldormen, were kings, 28; judges and generals, 33 n.; were reguli, sub-reguli, principes, 215; their possessions, 216.
- Aldorthegn, A.-S. a maintaining thegn, the chief of thegns, 129.
- Ale, (A.-S. alodh), liquid nutriment, from Sskt. al, whence alu, an edible root, 34; ridiculous derivations of ale, ib. n. See Aul.
- Alere, Lat. to nourish; its Teut. and Goth. cognates, and derivation from Sskt. al, 26; referred by Pott to Sskt. ridh, crescere, to grow, 34 n.; correspondence with alen, aljan, &c. 26, 27.
- Aletudo, Low Lat. aliment, nourishment; cognate of Goth. alid-s, nourished, 34.
- Aleu, Aleuf, O. Fr. an alod, q. v. 35.
- ALEXANDER SEVERUS, his feudal law, 87.
- Alh, Go. a temple, Sskt. alayam, a hall, 243.
- Aljan, Go. Alian, A.-S. to nourish, cognates of alere, 26.
- Alimentum, Alimonium, Alitura, Lat. nourishment, matter of nourishment, cognates of alod, q. v. 34, 35.
- Allegiance, Gothic, principles of, 113; Anglo-Saxon oath of, 114; modern doctrine of, not founded upon the Gothic constitutions, 116; but upon Norman, 117; Frank, oath of, 116; Norman oaths, 117; the Gothic allegiance compatible with liberty, ib.
- Allodial Land, 133.
- Allodium, Low Lat. properly alodium, 34; Pott's derivation, 35 n.; Ihre's 133 n.
- Allotments of conquered territory, Barbarian, 80
- Alod, Teut. nutriment; allodial land; land for the maintenance of a heir, his aliment, alimony, &c. 34, 35 n.; heritable without military or other service, 140.

- Alodarii, Low Lat. by signif. proprietors of alods, but in Domesday, lords paramount of manors, 35; surrender their inheritances to become feodatories, 66; becomes a term of reproach, 91.
- Alodes, de conquestu, de donatione imperatoris, de hereditate, 141 n.
- Alodh, A.-S. liquid aliment, ale; etymologically the same word as alod, 35.
- Alodio, tenere in, Lat. meaning of the phrase, 97.
- Alodium, Wachter's derivation of, 90.
- Alodum, Low Lat. an alod, 34; corresponds with alodh, 35.
- Aloth, A.-S. the same as alodh, 34, n.
- Alotum, a form of alodum, 35.
- Aloud, Franc, O. Fr. free allodial land, 35.
- Aloy, O. Fr. an alod, 35.
- Altherro, O. G. a maintaining lord, equivalent to Aldorman, 29.
- Altor, Lat. a nourisher, maintainer. See aldor.
- Alu, Skst. an edible root; its European cognates, 26.
- ALUISS, in Northern Mythology, probably the same as the Indian Sage, Alavala, 27 n.
- Ama, Skst. near, by : amatya, one who is at hand, a minister, counsellor (of state), 108 n, whence Norse am-, em-, A.-S. am-, om-, in compounds denoting office or employment; and Ger. ambt, amt, office, charge, &c.
- Ambacht, O. G. anteced. and Sskt. bhaj, to serve, a general term for office, 108, n.
- Ambacti, Lat., from Belgic, military officers, the comites of Tacitus, 108; followers of knights, and connected with clientes, 110. See ama, and ambacht. Professor Pott's derivation, 108, n.
- Ambachtman, O. G. an imperial minister or counsellor, 109.
- Ambaht, 109. See ambacht.
- Ambascia, Low Lat. Sskt. ama and bhaj, (see ama), confidential service or employment, 110.
- Ambassador, from preceding through Sp. embaxador. This word terminates with Sskt. r. tri, to cross over. A confidential servant or prince's minister, despatched on business abroad, 108, 110.
- Ambatscia, in the Salic Law, 108. See ambascia.
- Ambt, O. G. service, from amatya; suprà, 108 n.
- Ameralii, Low Lat. sea officers, 297. See amirom.
- Amici, Lat. friends, but restricted to an emperor's companions; a title or order, 83. See konungs vinr.
- Amiræi, Low Lat. prætors, a sort of governors, 298. See amirom.
- Amirom, Arab., a leader, 298.
- Ammiral, "the admiral," or a first rate ship of war, 298.
- Amrayl, O. E., from amirom, a commander of troops among the Saracens, 298, n.
- Amt, G., from ambt, whence amtman, a man in office, governor, bailiff, as of a castle, etc. 108, n.
- Amyrayl, O. E., a Saracen prince, 298, n. From amirom.
- ANGLO-SAXON, its affinity to the Sanskrit, ch. I, p. 10. Feods, 140, &c., more traces of them in A.-S. laws than in many Germanic codes of same period, 143; people, their difficult conquest of Britain, 146.

Antrustio, Low Lat., a liege subject, faithful vassal in office; from Sskt. r. dhru, to be steadfast, 121.

Apothecary, Gr., an officer, i. e. keeper of place where confections were made or preserved, 272, n.

Arbergaria, Low L., right of a feudal lord to free quarters; see herberg, 135.

Arberge, O. F., id. ib.

Armiger, Low Lat., one that carries his master's armour, 346.

Arms, rite or custom of swearing upon, 112. See Wapnatak.

Army, among the Irish, any number of soldiers; the A.-S. here, a gang of thirty-four thieves; the Norse her, one hundred people; the Longob. exercitus, four armed men, 202, n.

Army leaders, their appellations, 123.

-arn, -ern, -irn, -orn, -urn,—terminations in the Indo-European languages, from Sanskrit urna, to cover, 263.

Arsacides, their feudal system, 62.

Ataman, a Cossack chief. See atta, 28.

Athanasius, the Goth. conqueror, a learned judge, meaning one skilled in the art of war, 183.

Atheling, from A.-S. ætheling, man of noble race; Judge Blackstone's opinion, 10, n.; above an alderman in Canute's time, 14. See Edlingi.

Ath, hyld, A.-S., oath of fealty, 113; form of, 114.

Athsweord, A.-S., oath sword, 181. See arms, wapentake, wapnatak.

Atta, Goth., a father, from Sskt. ad, to eat, 41.

Auberge, Fr., place of entertainment. See arberge, herberg.

Aul, O. Norse, ale, explained to be aliment in the Edda, 27, n. See al, alodh.

Aula, Lat., a hall, court; Goth. alh, a temple; Sskt. alayan, a hall, 243.

Avenor, O. E., from Fr. avoine, from Lat. avena, oats, with the common termination or=ari, eri, &c.—(See For. Q. Rev. X.) This termination denoting a man, and erroneously explained by Lat. vir, A.-S. wer (as in burhwar, citizens), is the Sskt. r. irr, to move, one that has life, an animal. Avenor was an officer of the stable, 293.

BABAS, a title of vassals of the royal family in Mewar: see Child, Enfans, Infanta, &c.

Baca, O. Span., a cow, from Lat. vacca, id. 340.

Bacalaria, Low Lat., cow land, apparently equivalent to oxgang of land, 340.

Bacalaria dominicaria, &c., demesne cow land, ib.

Bacalaria facere, 341.

Bacalarius, Low Lat., same as the French baceler and bachelor, one that holds a bacalaria, 340.

Baccalaureus comes, Low. Lat., a bachelor companion, 338.

Bacele, Bacelle, O. Fr., (baca, a cow,) a cow land, 340.

Bacellor, O. Fr., holder of a bacele; a bachelor, ib.

- Bachele, O. Fr., (bacha, a cow,) cow land, 340.
 Bachele (la) faire, 341.
 Bachelor, holder of a bachele, ib. See Chevalier, whence Bachelerux, O. Fr., explained by Selden in its secondary sense of bold, 339.
 Bachellor, from Fr., its origin referred by Selden to the appellation of a Greek soldier, buccellarius, 12.
 Bachellor, Knights, 338, &c.
 Bachelor, poor, 341.
 Bachelor, temp., Hen. III., an unmarried person, 345.
 Bachevelereux, O. Fr., explained by Selden as bachelereux, 33 ; but as bachelereux from bachelor, so this from bascheveler, and unquestionably it was written with s.
 Baga, Low Lat., a district ; etymologically the same as pagus, 213.
 Bailiff, governor of a province, 240 ; the missus regis, 241. See bhala.
 Bailli, Fr., a judge, the chief of the Jurats, in the Channel Islands, 274.
 Bailus, Low Lat., a governor, 240.
 Baly, O. E., jurisdiction of a bailiff, ib.
 Ban, Teut. & Slav., a lord ; Goth. fan, Pers. banu, a lord ; Sskt. bhanu, the sun, a prince, 280 : how connected with banner, ib.
 Band, kindred, 54.
 Band, Pers., fascia, 286 ; Arab., a large standard, ib.
 Banderet, O. Fr., a standard bearer, 367.
 Bandaria, Low Lat., a standard, 286.
 Bandhata, Sskt., a band of kinsmen, 286, n. See kindred band.
 Banerer, Scot., an ordinary standard bearer, 283.
 Banerherren, Norse, lords entitled to raise their own standards ; banner-lords, 286 ; bauner lords, 283, &c.
 Banneret, Fr., bearer of a small banner, 365 ; creation of, 366.
 Banners, why placed upon border fortresses, and outer walls of castles, 282 ; military usage respecting, 283 ; delivery of, on investiture, 284.
 Bar, Teut., a strong man, a hero ; Sskt. vira, same, 304 ; its cognates, 305.
 Barbari, Lat., barbarians, all who were not Romans, 92 ; Gr. barbaroi, same ; Arab. barbar, a desert ; became a term of honour in opposition to Romani, 91.
 Barbarian Codes, though composed in Latin, preserve the terms of the original Teutonic laws, 94, 95, n.
 BARBAROSSA, FRED., his law against associating with Italians, unless they spoke German, 98, n.
 Baro, baron, 300, &c.
Baro et rico homo, Span. Lat., a baron and great nobleman, 309. See rico, rikr, &c.
 Baro, Lat., a mercenary soldier, derived by Isidore from Greek barus, heavy, 304, n. It is the same as the Teut. bar, a strong man, Sskt. vira, a man.
 Baro, Low Lat., a man, in contrast with femina and mulier, 306
 Baron, derivations by Drs. Webster and Richardson, 11, n. ; the title

- popularly given to gentlemen whose ancestors were summoned to parliament, Addit. Notes on p. 220 ; its Asiatic and European cognates, 305 ; division into great and less, 307 ; an importation from France, 321.
- Barones, farones, varones, &c., Low Lat., barons, 301, &c.
- Barons, great and less, 307.
- Barony, government of, resembled that of a kingdom, 231.
- Baronye, O. E., employed for kingdom, 323.
- Barus, Low Lat., a man, 94, 306.
- Baschevalier, O. Fr., an inferior knight, supposed to be a bacheller, 341.
- Basileus, Gr., a king, probably from Sanskrit r. pash, to dispose in order : title of some Saxon kings, 200.
- Batal, Arab., a champion, Persic, cutting, 303.
- Batta, in Bengali, military service, pay or rations. See bhatta, feod, &c. 50, n.
- Battle, Fr. bataille, a trial of strength. See the etymology, 303, n.
- Baupje, a royal title in Rajasthan, literally answering to sire, in the sense of father, 328.
- Beefeater, Fr. bæufetier, a contraction of langue de bæuf, a kind of spear, 45.
- Bellagines, Low. Lat., bye laws among the Goths, 236.
- Bellhouse, a Saxon relic of the sounding war shield in the ancient herberg and heristall, 126. See tinel du roy.
- Benefices, Lat. benefacere, to do well to another ; origin of, 66, n.
- Beneficium et munus, Lat., benefice and gift, 76, 141.
- Bengali military service, statement of the batta, and emoluments of an artillery officer, 50, n.
- Beod geneat, A.-S., a table participator, table companion, palace count, 157.
- Beorn, A.-S., a nobleman, a prince, 158 : from Sanskrit vira, a strong man, a hero. It is probably the A.-S. form of baron.
- Berewic, A.-S., a berwick, place of defence, the name of a dreng, 160.
- Berne, Scot., Pinkerton's derivation, 321.
- Berné, O. Fr., a nobleman, the same as baron, ib.
- Bers, O. F., for baron, ib.
- Bhadilah, Sskt., a strong man, a hero, 303, n.
- Bhaj, Sskt. r., to serve : see ambacht, ambiht, &c.
- Bhala, Hindûstani, a lance, sign manual of the hereditary premier of Mewar, 240.
- Bhan, Sskt. r., to shine ; bhanu, the son, a prince, 280. See ban, banner, fahn, fan, fana, vahn.
- Bhat, Sskt. r., to nourish, feed, 40, 46, 49 ; etymon of feodum, food, paiti, pay or ration, bhatta, &c.
- Bhat, Hindû., boiled rice ; from preceding, 50, n.
- Bhata, Hindû., military pay or allowance, ib.
- Bhatah, Sskt., a soldier, one that receives bhati, 46.
- Bhati, Sskt., from bhat, wages, pay, ration, 49, n.
- Bhatta, same ; in Mewar a ration, 50, n.
- Bhogika, Sskt., an eater, a groom ; from bhoga, eating, 46.

- Bhoomia, in Rajasthan, an allodial proprietor, opposed to feudal or military tenant, from Skst. bhumi, the ground, 36.
- Birleman, A.-S. a butler, 272. See byrel.
- BLACKSTONE, SIR WILLIAM, on maxim of feudal tenure, 58; origin of feudal system, 70 n., 89 n.
- Bodyguards, a prince's, called a fortress, and a wall of shields, 84 n.
- Bon amy et dru*, O. Fr. feudal phrase, good friend and faithful subject, "good friend and true." 122.
- Bona et cattalla*, Low Lat. goods and chattels, explanation and origin of the phrase, 94 n.
- Bondar, O. N. rural proprietors of land, Persic bund, an estate; their behaviour in the national assemblies, 138.
- Bonde, O. N. a land owner, 131; etymol. ib. n.
- Bonds, landowners, 130, &c.
- Boni homines, goodmen, fighters, knights, 315, &c.
- Bonne homme (for bon homme), Fr., a goodman or master of a family, 315. See goodman.
- Boot, a leathern wine bag, 264. See butler.
- Bordarius, Low Lat., from A.-S. bord, a table, and -ari, a masculine termination, for the meaning of which, see avenor, (in Ind.): explained to be a cottager who supplied his lord's table with poultry, &c.—(Spelman, in v. bordaria.) An officer in the household of Henry II., 272.
- Bordgeneat, A.-S., same as beodgeneat, 157.
- Bordweall, A.-S., wall of shields, prince's body guard, 84, n.
- Bornou, in Africa, feudal system, 73.
- Boroughreeve, 278.
- Borsholder, O. E., from A.-S. burh (byrig), a fortress or castle; a castellan, afterwards head of a town, 229.
- Botelerye, O. E., a butlery, 263: from bote, a leathern wine bag.
- Botellaria, Low Lat., the butlery in Henry II's. household, 263, n.
- Bottle, a leathern wine bag, or little boot, viz. a small butt, 264.
- Bottles, arms of the family of Bouteiller, in France, 265.
- Botwand, O. Sw., wand or rod of message, its use and signification, 240.
- Boucillus, Low Lat., a bushel or leathern wine bag, 264, n.
- BOULAINVILLIERS, COUNT de, on the possession of land in common, among the French conquerors of Gaul, 64.
- Bound, Eng., Pers. bund; in the sense of limit or country, 57.
- Bouteille, Fr., a bottle, anciently a little boot, i. e. leathern bag, 264.
- Boy, in marpahis, derivation of, 291.
- Brave, bravo, Engl. and Fr. Ital., a brave man, cognate of frau, from Sanskrit prabha, a master, lord, 210.
- Brödlinge, brötessen, Teut., domestics, eating the bread of brotherr or bread lord, 45. See fedesl, hlafæta, hlaforð.
- Buccellarius, bucellarius, a kind of soldier, in the middle ages, named from the cake served for his ration, 46, n., 338, 339, n.
- Budkafle, O. Norse, a message rod, rod of command, 241. See bailiff.

- Bund, Pers., from Sskt. bhundatum, to maintain, the etymon of bonde, -band, fund, fundus, &c., 131.
- Buoni homini, buonomini, Ital, goodmen, countrymen, 315.
- Burg, Teut., a castle turretted and fortified : probably the Sanskrit puri, a city ; defined to be a collection or cluster of houses, 359, n.
- Burgenda Holm, O. N., the isle of the Burgends, now Borneholm, the ancient seat of the Burgundi, 192, n.
- Burgesses, superior to commoners, 361.
- Burggraff, O. G. the graff of a burg, 277.
- Burgh, Eng. & Scot. from A.-S burh, a city or borough, a place fortified with a castle, 254 & n. Sir W. Scott's description of ancient burgh in Zetland, ib. & 256.
- Burghgreve, O. E. a sort of bailiff, the same as boroughreve, 278.
- Burgundi, king of, called hendinos, the signification and etymol. of this word, 190, 192.
- Burh, A.-S. a city, town, compared with Skst. puri, same, 254 n.
- Burlaw men, Scot. bye law men, 236.
- Burschap, Iceland., place of meeting to make bye laws, ib.
- Burthegn, A.-S., a bower (chamber) thane, a chamberlain,
- Busellarius, Low Lat., a leather wine-bag keeper, 263.
- But, butt, from A.-S. butta, bytta, a bag of leather, 264.
- Butelaria, butellaria, Low Lat., butlery, 263 & n.
- Butericas, A.-S., leathern bags, 265.
- Buticula, Low Lat., a little leather bag, 264.
- Buticularius, 263.
- Butler, 261, &c., a bottler, or leather wine-bag keeper, 264.
- BUTLER, family of, their arms are skinks, 265.
- Butta, Lat., a boot, butt, leathern bag, 264.
- Byelaws, explanation of, 235, 6.
- Byle, bylle, Sw. & Nor., a little habitation ; a vill ; Sskt. palli, a village, 236.
- Byrel, A.-S., a bearer (of liquor to drink), 267.
- Bytta, see but.

CABALLARIA, Low Lat., from caballus, a horse in trappings ; the same as chevalerie, the tenure and tenement of one that holds by horse service, 337.

Cabaliero, Sp., a chevalier, 337.

Caballiero, Sp., ib. 236.

Caballus, Low Lat., a horse ; Sskt. kap, to move. It is the cognate of Gr. hippos, Siles. hampel and happel ; Sw. and Dan. hoppa, and our hobby, 337, 340, n.

Caffres, their treatment of the old and infirm, 31, n.

Camerae houetmannorum, Low Lat., chambers or sessions of the headmen of a city, 210. See haubtman, heofodman, &c.

Camerarii, Lat., chamberlains, officers in the household of Anglo-Saxon noblemen, 156, n.

Camerlengus Major, Low Lat., a chief chamberlain, 272, n. : from an un-

- usual diminutive of camera, a chamber, and the attributive termination -eng, q. d. cameralengus. The Fr. chambellan, originally chamberlan or chambrelan, which has now a low meaning, is the same word.
- Capitainerie, Fr., a commandery, 211.
- Capitaneus, Lat., a head-man, the same as haubtmann, heofodman, haufuding, &c., 210 ; a principal vassal of a sovereign, 360, n.
- Captain, from preceding, a supreme governor, 204. See 210.
- Carnifex, in Low Lat., a cook, and also a butcher : appears also to be an executioner. A high officer in the court of Hardicnute, 250, n.
- Castellan, see borsholder.
- Castellum, a castle, not connected with kastali, 248.
- Catalla, Low Lat., chattels : from Sskt. ghata, a water pot, through A.-S. cetel, Goth. katala, a kettle, 94, n.
- Cavaliero, It., one that holds by horse service, 336.
- Cavallaria, Low Lat., the portion of a caballiero, assigned as his pay, 337.
- Chamuh, Sskt., the eater, an army, 42, 53. See batta, eating ; feod, food ; paiti, pay, &c.
- Chattels, originally kettles. See catalla.
- Chevalier, Fr., horseman, a knight, one that holds by horse service, 336 ; d'ost, 341.
- Chevalerie, chevalry, service of, 338, &c. Its use and titles in Scandinavia, 335.
- Cheventein, Fr., a chieftain, captain, 210.
- Child, a young nobleman, 327, &c.
- Ching, O. Eng., a king, 197.
- Chivaler à baner, Fr., a knight banneret, 338.
- Chlodovæus, Low Lat., from O. Germ. Hludwig, whence Ludwig, Lodovic, &c., and from Chlodovæus, Louis, Lewis, &c. The word appears to be hlud=clyt, in the Lat. in-clyt-us, and wiga, a warrior, a noble warrior : his division of plunder, 58 ; improbability that his barons would declare they had no title to their share, 59 ; Mr. Hallam's opinion, 64.
- Chunna, in Salic Law, for hun or hund, one hundred, 197.
- Chursa, in Mewar, a skin or hide of land, 47.
- Cid, O. Sp., from Arab., a lord, 82, n.
- Cimbri and Teutons, their offer to become feudal vassals to the Roman republic, 78.
- Circassia, its feudal system, 74.
- Circuits of Judges, their origin, 274.
- Cliens, Lat., a dependent upon a patron, 44.
- Clientes, Lat., military followers, 110.
- Clovis, see Chlodovæus.
- Clytus, Low Lat., a king's son. The word is either a part of Lat. inclytus, famous, or the Teut. hlud, loud (Sskt. hlad, to rejoice), make a sound of joy ; if so, inclytus=in-lætus, is etymologically connected with A.-S. gladian, to make glad. Clytus and Clitus used for atheling, 10, n.

- Cniht, A.-S., a boy, servant, knight, primarily a kinsman, 108, n., 329, 333. See Knight.
- Coci, Lat., cooks, officers in a Saxon household, 156, n. See Carnifex.
- Comarca, Sp., a boundary, a co-mark or march, 279.
- Comdorii, Low Lat., inferior counts, perhaps from comitores, 297.
- Comes, Lat., a companion, count; as a title it appears to be a translation of gesindh, gisindo, &c., 82; a kind of judge, see gravio. — palatii, 249, — stabuli, 289, — thesauriorum, 295, — viarum, 260.
- Comites, pl. of comes, among ancient Germans, horsemen, 104; paid for their services in food, 83; were the comrades of their chiefs, 16; styled consules, 215.
- Comitores, Lat., from comites, 297.
- Commodore, from comdorius, ib.
- Commonalty, 361; are the plebs, 363.
- Commoner, 360, &c.; improperly applied, 361; not a gentleman, but one of the rascality, 363; divisions of commoners, 364.
- Companionship, between chiefs and followers, 54.
- Conquæstor, Lat., rendered conqueror; in feudal law, an acquirer or purchaser, 156.
- Consonants, canon of transition of, 16, 17.
- Constable and Marshal, 289, &c.
- Consuetudines, Lat., customs of an Anglo-Saxon nobleman's court of pleas, 156, n.
- Consul, used for comes and eorl, 215, 297.
- Court baron, 231; — leet, 120, 231; — of honour, 351.
- Cowardice, ancient formula of denunciation of, 106.
- Cup-bearer, see scoll, scull, scullion.
- Cwen, A.-S., a woman, wife, queen, 207: from Sskt. kanya, a young woman, 208, n.
- Cwic feoh, A.-S., living cattle, 296.
- Cyning, A.-S., a king; Mr. Kemble's derivation of, 193.
- Cyninges tun, the manor of an Anglo-Saxon king, 359.
- Czar, Slav., a watchman, 167.
- DAM, E., Dama, Sp., a mother, 209; ? Sskt. tam, to grieve. The word exists in the Sskt. compound dampati, i. e. wife-husband or husband and wife.
- Dame, Fr., a lady, a contraction of domna, for domina, ib.
- Damoisel, Fr., a young nobleman; contraction of domnicellus, 328.
- Damunah, Sskt., a tamer, subduer, hero, equivalent to Lat. dominus, 184.
- Dan, Persic, a rich man; Sskt. dhanin, wealthy, 328.
- Dan or Daur, first king of the Danes, 20, 374.
- Danavas, descendants of Danu, ib.
- Dans, O. E., probably dan, 328.
- Danzel, O. Fr., young nobleman; from domnicellus, 328.
- Dapifer, Low Lat., officer in Saxon household, 156, n.; perhaps a tapper of liquor, 271.

- Dedis hond, statue of, 357.
- Dempster, a judge ; see domari, 183.
- Dispenser, a steward, 260.
- Dhriti, a descendant of Kuni, q. v. ; perhaps the original of dryhten, truhten, &c., 194, n.
- Dhru, Sskt., to be established : see truth, 122.
- Di, Mexican, a great lord, 178.
- Diar, O. Norse, lords, sovereigns, 177, 372.
- Diet, a council of states ; from Goth. thiuda, people, 181.
- Dii, Lat., gods, contraction of divi ; from Sskt. deva, a god, inhabitant of div, the sky, 178.
- Disc (dish) thane, A.-S., attendant at table, 272.
- Dispensator, Lat. ; see spencer.
- Dogtyman, O. E., a doughty or valiant man ; A.-S. thyhtig, stout, 182.
It appears to be synonymous with goodman, q. v.
- Domari, O. Norse, a doomer, a judge, 183, 4.
- Domicellus, Low Lat., a young nobleman, 328.
- Domini et homines*, lords and vassals, in the Saxon Latin laws, 155.
- Dominus, Lat., a lord, master : see damunah, 184.
- Domnicellus, Low Lat., young noblemen, contraction of preceding, 328.
- Don manrædenne anwalds*, A.-S., to do homage to a superior, 48 ; derivation, 56, n.
- Don, see dan.
- Donzelle, It., a young nobleman ; from domnicellus, 328.
- Doomers, judges, 184, &c.
- Drench, from O. N. drengur ; in Domesday the holder of a manor, 159.
- Dreng, drengur, a brave man, 160 ; who may be deemed one, 161.
- Drengage tenure, 159, &c.
- Drengotus, Osmundus, 160.
- Drinclean, A.-S., wages in drink, 52.
- Dronnyng, O. Dan., a queen, 176, n.
- Drost, Germ., a trusty subject in office, p. 121.
- Drosteid, a drost's oath of fealty, 151.
- Droting, Finnish, for drottning.
- Drottinn, O. Norse, a lord, 176, 177, 207. See dhriti.
- Drottning, fem. preceding, in Sweden and Denmark, the title of a queen, 176 ; a lady, 207.
- Drottsæt, O. Norse, mistaken by Wachter for a corruption of drostsæt, 121.
- Dru, O. Fr., a true man or subject, 122. See dhru.
- Druerie, O. Fr., the state of a dru, 123.
- Druhtin, O. G., a lord, 177. See dryhten.
- Drygt, O. E., a lord ; from dryhten, 177, n.
- Dryhten, A.-S., a lord, perhaps dhriti, 176.
- Dryhtguma, A.-S., a feudal vassal, 167.
- Ducarius, Low Lat., apparently an inferior duke, 297.
- Duces limatanei, Lat., wardens of marches, 87.

- Duces, Lat., dukes, a title of aldormen, 215.
- Duke, a leader with absolute power, 202. See heretoga.
- Duel, ancient law, 159, n.
- Dux Francorum, title of a mayor of the palace, 251.
- Dyeta, Low Lat., a diet. Du Cange's mistake, 181, n.
- Dyot, O. E., a diet; from Goth. thiuda, ib.
- EALDOR, A.-S., an aldor, q. v. hundredes ealdor.
- Ealdormen, A.-S., aldermen; kings of Wessex, 28; erroneous derivations, 29; Anglo-Saxon ditto, 32; used by king Alfred for the prætores and præfecti of Orosius, 215. See aldoras, aldorman.
- Earl, from A.-S., 217, &c.; ancient creation of a king into one, 205, 6; absurd derivations, 217; Sæmund's, 218; translated princeps in the title of William I., Addit. Notes on, 220; northern earls, 222; some had subordinate earls, 223; popular earls, 220.
- Eating, titles, appellations and terms denoting eating or furnishing food, 46. See brötessen, brötherr, gramur (in addit. notes, 200), chamuh, faud, paiti, pay, batta, aldii, epulæ et convictus, &c.
- Edda, O. Norse, its signification, 375, n.
- Edeling, O. G., a man of family, 160; corresponds with patricius, 169.
- Edelknaben, G., noble boys, pages, 292, n.
- Edlenherren, G., noble barons, 320.
- Edlingi, Low Lat., for nobiles, 170.
- Einvaldskonungur, O. N., a king of single power or rule, namely, an arbitrary monarch, 205.
- Elder, see aldor.
- Embassador, see ambascia.
- Emphyteusis, Gr., suggested by Sir F. Palgrave as the etymon of feodum, 50.
- Enfant, Fr., a child; title of an heir apparent, 327.
- Enfes d'Angleterre, O. F. In preceding, prince of England, 327. See Baba, child, adolescens, infanta, &c.
- Engi, Kelt., to be born; supposed to be the original of the termination -ing, in gentile nouns. Addit. Notes, 214. See -in, -ing.
- Eorl, A.-S., an earl, synonymous with atheling, alderman, as a title, 215.
- Eorles stiward, A.-S., steward of an earl, 252; —tun, manor of an earl, 359.
- Eriksgata, O. N., the circuit or perambulation of a kingdom for the administration of justice, 274.
- Ertzherzog, G., an archduke, the honored war leader, 224.
- Escantiones, Low Lat., skinkers in the household of Henry II., 266: from Sskt. sankha or shanka, a shell.
- Escheat, one of the incidents of feodality among the Anglo-Saxons and Rajpoots of Mewar, 149, 150.
- Escuage, scutage, one of the instances of the feudal system in Saxon England and Rajasthan, 153, n.
- Escuyer, O. Fr., a shield bearer, esquire, 347.
- Esquire, from preceding, 345, &c.

- Estates, beneficiary, changed to hereditary, 96.
 Estigia, Low Lat., for hostisia, 259.
 Ethel, A.-S., native country, or father-land, 132.
 Etheling, from A.-S., of a noble family, 170, 214, 219.
 Etymology, scientific, advantages to historical research, 9, &c.; its use in ascertaining the import of titular honors, 2, 10, 11; conjectural adhered to by lexicographers, 11.
 Europe, early population of, 77.

 FAA, FAW, Johnny, the corrupt appellation of a Gipsey chief, 42; is an earl, 221. See senapati.
 Faad, O. Dan., governor of a district, 41; from Sskt. pati, a lord.
 Fad, Gothic fads, from Sskt. pati; among the Visigoths, a judge, 41.
 Fadreins, Goth, a family, its agreement with paternus, 43.
 Fads, fadhs, in Goth. compounds, a leader; cognate of Sskt. pati, a lord, 41.
 Fahn, O. G., a banner, 285; — lehn, a banner feod, 284. See bhanu, ban, fan.
 Fala, O. G., a wooden tower, cognate of Lat. palus, 245.
 Falanza, O. G., a palace, from fala, 246.
 Familiares, Lat., kinsmen attendant on a German chief, 157.
 Fan, Goth., a lord, 280: see bhanu, pan.
 Fana, A.-S., a banner, standard, 280.
 Far, O. Burgund., a strong man, hero, 305; whence Farones, Low Lat., barons, ib.
 Farm, A.-Saxon feorme, food, a farm; Sskt. bhri, to support, to fill, 51.
 Farrier, 294.
 Father, its cognates: see pater. Dr. Webster's derivation, 40, n.
 Faw, Johnny: see Faa.
 Fawd, see faad.
 Fealty, oaths of, A.-Saxon, Frank. and Norman, 107.
 Fedesl, A.S, one that is fed, a domestic servant, 45; Icelandic fædsla, food, nourishment.
 Fedium, Low Lat., a feod in 1090, 51. See feod.
 Fees, military, among the Anglo-Saxons, 47, 48, n.; Normans, 166.
 Fehgerefa, A.-S., a treasurer, 297; by the signification of the words, a receiver of fee or money.
 Fellones, Low Lat., infideles subditi, 143.
 Fellonia, Low Lat., the earliest orthography of felonia, a breach of fealty, 142; Sskt. bhal, to kill.
 Felony, might be committed by a lord against the tenant, as well as the contrary, 113; the feudal law on this subject, 123 and note.
 Feod, (Low Lat. feod-, feud-um; from Sskt. bhati, wages, from bhat, to nourish, sustain.) Among the ancient Germans, 23; Anglo-Saxon system of, 140, &c.; incidents of, among Anglo-Saxons and Rajpoots, 146; miscellaneous duties of an Anglo-Saxon, 154.
 Feoda, Low Lat., for tenements, 155.

- Feodalism, feodality, and feudal system,—patriarchal nature of, 37; character of, in Asia, 38; where the European originated, 62; more ancient than commonly supposed, 58; characters of, cannot exist without its presence, 60.
- Feodal system, primitive and universal, 57, &c.; not original among the Germans, 62; in Scandinavia and Central Asia, 68; Pinkerton, on its universality, 69; Richardson, on the Indian, Persian, and Tartarian, 70; Patton, on its pastoral origin, ib.; in Turkey, 72; in Africa, 73; in the Sandwich Islands, ib.; in the Caucasus, 74; in Livonia, ib.; in ancient Britain, 75; known to the Cimbri and Teutons, 78; but forgotten by the Romans, 79; reasons against its ascribed origin among the Romans, 76-99; Selden, on its origin, 86; Palgrave, on ditto, 88; Blackstone, on ditto, 89, n.; prevailed all over Scandinavia, 100-139, and the Faroe Islands, 13, 144; existed wherever land was acquired by arms, 145.
- Feodal law, rise of, 97.
- Feodum militis, Low Lat., a knight's fee, translated a knight's meat-home, 46
- Feodum, Stiernhelm's derivation from föda, food, 47; first use of the word, 48, 141; its connection with the Sanskrit root bhat, to nourish with food, 49; absurd derivations, 49, 50.
- Ferrura, Low Lat., office or duty of a farrier, 255.
- Feudum francale, 357; —nobile, 146.
- Fidelis homo devenire, 135, n.
- Fidem dare and vexillare. See fahn and vahn lehn.
- Fidem dare, et firmitatem facere, become homagium facere, 95.
- Firmitas, in Low Lat., a league or compact, 122.
- Firr, O. N., a strong man, hero. See baron, farones.
- Föde by, Dan., native land, the place of one's food, 48. See metehom.
- Fogat, fogde, fougti, Sw., a governor, 42, n., 136, n.
- Fole cyning, A.-S., a national king, 199.
- Food, support, maintenance, idea of, the basis of words denoting master and servant, chief and follower, &c., 34, 44, 46, ib. n.; given as pay for services, 52, &c.; plenty of, denoted wealth, 53; the pay of the comites, amici, and grati, in the court of Tiberius, as well as among the ancient Germans, 83. See aldor, &c., atta, bhogika, brotesen, chamuh, &c., fud, father, fawd, gramur, Addit. Notes to p. 220; hlaſæta, hlaſord, päti, pater, pitri, &c. &c., with their dependencies.
- Forensic terms, barbarian, Latinized, 94, 95, n.
- Foreman, formadr, O. N., a prince, 211.
- Formæl, A.-S. (Sskt. mela, a meeting to make bargains and sales), fore or former speech, the precontract between a lord and a vassal, preparatory to taking the mutual obligation of fealty, 114.
- Fowd of Zetland, the Danish governor of, 136. See faad, fad, &c.
- Fowdrie, peel or pile of, a Lancashire castle, 135, n.
- Flag, to strike the, origin and meaning of, 284, n.
- Franc aloud, O. Fr., a frank or free alod, 35.

- Francalia, Low Lat., frank lands, 357.
 Francalius, the possessor of francalia, a franklin, 357.
 Franc ome, O. Fr., a free man, nobleman, 92, n.
 Francus, a Frank by nation, when first mentioned, 233.
 Franklin, possessor of frank lands, correspondence with seigneur de la terre, 357; might be hanged for felony, ib. n. (see gentleman), though he might be an esquire, and of considerable estate, ib. n. Fortescue; appears with vavasor to be same as Saxon churl, having thaneright, 358. See vavasor.
 Frank pledge, view of, 120.
 Fraunclein, O. Fr., a franklin, 357.
 Fraunke ferme, a sort of tenure, 233.
 Fraunkeleyn of toun, O. E., 325, n.
 Frau, G., a lady; Snorro's derivation, 209.
 Freyherr, Friherr, G., a baron, 319, 320.
 Frilingi, Low Lat., free men, nobles, 170.
 Frithburg, A.-S., a free town, jurisdiction of a burgh, 162.
 Fürst, G., the first, a prince, 211.
 Fundus, Lat., an estate, 51; agrees with Persic bund, same; from Sskt. bhundatum, to support, maintain.
 Furiston, O. G., first men, procures, 212, n.
 Fylki, O. N., a province, number of fifty men, 199.
 Fylkiskonungr, O. N., king of a fylki, ib.
 Fyrde faran, A.-S., to go on a military expedition, 47.
 Fyrdwite, A.-S. expedition mulct, the A.-S. scutage, 150, 153.
- GADI, Sskt., the thunderer, an epithet of Vishnu. See god, goodman, &c.
 Gadrauhteis, Goth., a body of soldiers, 176, 177. See Miles.
 Gasindhai, Goth., company of persons, 80. See gesidh, gisindo, sithi.
 Gasindi, Low Lat., companions, taken for trusty friends, vassals, 80, n.
 Gasindium, Low Lat., company, taken for a ducal household, 80.
 Gau, Sskt., a cow. See bacele, bachellor, chursa, cowland, ox-gang.
 Gau, G., a territory, tract of land, 121. This may be a cognate of the Greek ge, the earth.
 GAUTAMA, family of, 20; a cow-tamer or lord, probably an allegorical personification of the Gauts or Goths, worshippers of the cow. See Savila, Sibillia, 21.
 Geber, see wer.
 Gedryht, A.-S., answering to Goth. gadrauht-eis, a company of soldiers, 177.
 Ge-fera, an equal or companion, the cognate of Lat. par; in Fr. paire, whence O. E. peer, 228.
 Ge-hyld, A.-S., a feudal protector, 115, 151. See hyllid, hold.
 Ge-neat, king's, A.-S., a co-participator, a sort of vassal, 157.
 Gengylman, O. E., apparently for gentylman, 352.
 Ge-not, O. G., same radical meaning as geneat, an equal, 159.
 Gentile, a term of honor among the Barbarians in opposition to Roman, 91.
 Gentillesse, O. Fr., qualities of nobility, 350; from gentilis, a gentile.

- Gentilitas, Lat., rendered paynemerye in O. English, 350.
- Gentilman, (trewe) O. E., a nobleman, 350 ; was exempted from hanging, 351 ; Selden, on the word, ib. ; creation of, ib. ; Chaucer's character of, 352.
- Gentil ome, O. Fr., a free, and therefore noble, man, 92, n.
- Gentilshombres, O. Fr. ; gentilshombres, O. Sp. See gentile.
- GENTLEMAN, 348, &c. ; meaning to be ascertained in an action at law, 349 ; offence in the Court of Honor, to assume the title without right, 353 ; Sir W. Scott on the word, 354.
- Gerefa, A.-S., a fiscal officer, literally a taker or receiver, the same as graffio, 229, 277.
- Gesellon, O. G., companions or vassals, 55. See gisello.
- Ge-sidh, A.S., a companion, title of a count, 80 ; Sanskrit etymon, 81 ; corresponded with comes, 229 ; changed to baron, 231.
- Gesidhescundman, A.-S., a man of the quality of a gesidh, 150, n.
- Gesidhesocna, A.-S., the jurisdiction of a gesidh, 235.
- Gesidhman, A.-S., a count, 230 ; some had lands, others had not, ib.
- Gespan, G., a comes in Hungary, 82 ; Wachter derives it from span, a tie or yoke ; but taking the radical signification of all these antient titles, is it not rather to be referred to the root of A.-S. spana, the mamma, and so denote a sort of kinsman, or one that derives support from the same source ?
- Ghasa, Skt., the etymon of case, hus, huus, house. See Palace Counts.
- GIBBON, his mistake as to the great splendour of an ancient king, 185.
- Gioraz hanns mann, O. N., a feudal formula, equivalent to homo fidelis devenire, 135, n.
- Gisello, G., a companion, one dwelling in the same house (sal), 55. See Palace Count.
- Gisindo, O. G., the same as gesidh, 80, 229.
- Gi-thigni, O. G., the same as co-thegn or co-thane, 129. See thegn.
- God, not derived from god, gud, &c., virtuous, nor from gudh, war, 310,
- God, A.-S., brave, prompt in fight, 310.
- Godakunds (manna), Goth., a nobleman ; a man of a noble, i. e. brave family, 314.
- Goda mæn, O. Sw., nobility, ib.
- Godemend, O. Dan., good-men, knights, 315, n.
- Godehemæn, Norw., good-men, apparently knights of a rank below hersir, 314.
- God-knygt, O. E., noble, i. e. brave knights, 310.
- Gograff, G., the graff or count ; fiscal judge, of a gau, territory, 121.
- Gomela, A.-S., and not aldorman or ealdorman, the term for old man, 32.
- Gonfanon, Fr., a standard of war, 285 : see gundfahn.
- Goodman, a proprietor, 315.
- Goodmen, ready fighters, knights, 310.
- Goods and chattels*, see catalla.
- Goodthegns, brave nobles, 310.
- Goodwif, goody, see gudame.

- Grabber, Low E., a cognate of gerefa, graff, gravio, greve, &c., 229.
- Grabh, O. Sanskrit form of grah, to take, receive, Addit. Notes to p. 229.
- Grabhaka, O. Sskt., a police officer, ib.
- Graff, G., a count; Wachter and Lye take it be from gerefa, transposed from gefera, a companion, 228: see grabh, graffio, gravio,; its compounds, 277, &c.
- Graffio, Low Lat., a fiscal appellation, 228, 229.
- Graffschafft, G., a county, 283.
- Gramur, Icel., in Runic poetry, the epithet of a king, or head man of a village, 200; radically a devourer, eater: see grass and Addit. Notes, 200.
- Grand and petit serjeanty*, 164.
- Grandshommes, Fr., nobility, 309.
- Gras, Sskt r., to eat, devour; as a noun, a mouthful; term for a fief in Mewar, 36; grant of a gras by the Maharaja Dheraj, 77.
- Grasya thacoor, in Mewar, a feudal lord; literally the eater of a mouthful, 35, 46.
- Grati, Lat., a title in the court of Tiberius, 84.
- Graven, Gefürstete, G., counts with the title of barons, 214, n.
- Gravio, Low Lat., a fiscal judge, 238.
- Greve, a reeve, varieties of, 277; Anglo-Saxon derivation, 278, n.
- Grome, Groyme, O. E., a groom, a warrior, 167.
- Guardareve, O. Fr., officer of the guard, 260.
- Gud, G.; Goth. guds, brave: see god.
- Gudame, O. E., a lady, 316.
- Gudemans, O. G., knights, 315, n.
- Gudh, A.-S., war; from Sanskrit yudh, to fight, 20; not the etymon of god or good, 313.
- Gudheyning, A.-S., a war king, a chief leader of kings in war, ib.
- Gudhfana, A.-S., a war banner, 285.
- Gund, O. G., war, 20.
- Gundfahn, G., war banner, 285.
- Gunni, N., war, 20.
- Guntfano, It., war banner, 285.
- Guotman, O. G., a goodman, noble, 311, 314.
- Gwas, Kelt., a cognate of vasus; a servant, 46; erroneously supposed to be the etymon of vasallus, 55, n.
- HÆRGRAVIUS, Low Lat., her, an army, and grave, a count acting as duke, 277.
- Hagestolten, O. G., rustic soldiers, bachelors, 342.
- Hagestollziatum jus*, Low Lat., 343.
- Haistaldi, Low Lat., rustic tenants, 342; soldiers in war, 344.
- HALLAM, his objection to the universality of feods, 58; comment on the conduct of Clovis, 64; excludes Sweden and Denmark from nations affected by the feudal system, 67.
- Hall companions and palace counts, 157, &c.

- Hall of the even kings*, treacherous massacre of royal guests in it, 203.
 Ham, A.-S., a home, from Sanskrit cham, to eat, Addit. Notes to 214.
 Hangsman, office performed by a man of rank in the fehmgerecht, 250, n.
 Hara, Sskt., plunder; the etymon of war, 123.
 Harbour, see herberg.
 Hari, epithet of an Indian deity, Addit. Notes; from hri, to seize by force, 319, 395.
 Harjis, Goth., a multitude, a host, an army, 195.
 Haslavollr, O. N., the plain of hazels, a staked field of battle, 244.
 Hauptman, G., a captain, head man, 210.
 Haufuding, O. N., a chief, the head person, ib.
 Head, use of its cognates in forming titles with the terminations -ing and -man, 189.
 Headborough, originally a castellan, 229.
 Heag- and hægsteald, A.-S., a bachelor, young soldier, 342.
 Heahgerefa, A.-S., a high reeve, 277.
 Heallthegn, A.-S., a hall thegn, palace count, 249.
 Hearra, A.-S., a lord, one that takes by force: see hara, 218.
 Heiemen, O. E., great men, grandshommes, 309.
 Heislisteingr, O. N., q. d. castle stakes: see haslavollr.
 Henchman, O. E., perhaps hengiman: see hangsman, 250, n.; in Denmark and Sweden, 273.
 Hendinos, O. Burg., a king, 190; a customary title of royalty, from hund=cent-um, 191, 192.
 Henker, G., see henchman.
 Heofodman, A.-S., head-man, captain, 210.
 Heorth-geneat, A.-S., partaker of a hearth, 249.
 Her, O. N., a company of one hundred men, an army; from hara, war, plunder, 124.
 Herad, O. N., division of a country, answering to hundred, 196.
 Heradskongr, king of a hundred, 196.
 Herbergerie, O. E., 124, 125.
 Here, A.-S., an army, and a band of robbers, 123, 195.
 Hereberg, A.-S., station of the here, 124.
 Herefær, herefyrd, A.-S., an expedition of the here, 55, n.
 Heregeat, A.-S., trappings of war, heriot, 143.
 Heretoga, A.-S., the toga, duke or dux, leader of the here, 124; has absolute power, 202; becomes king, 203; synonymous with aldorman, 216.
 Heriot and relief, 147.
 Heristallum, Low Lat., station of the her, 124.
 Herivart, O. G., expedition of the her, 55, n.
 Herizoho, O. G., the same as heretoga.
 Herkongr, O. N., king of the her, a war king, 200.
 Hero, Gr., a strong man, 301.
 Herör, O. N., arrow of war, its use and signification, 241.
 Herr, Teut., an army, 195.

- Herr, G., a lord, seizer by force, 218, 319.
- Hersir, a Norwegian baron; Sanskrit irsa, a governor, 305.
- Hertogi, Hertugi, same as heretoga.
- Hertzog, Herzog, G., a duke; from herizoho, 212, 213.
- Hestald, see heagsteald.
- Hestasvein, O. N., a horse boy, 290.
- Hidalgo, Sp., a gentleman; derivation, 93, n.
- Hirdmen, courtiers, 273: see hyredmen.
- Hirstiorur, O. N., governor of a court, 271, n.
- Hlafæta, A.-S., a bread eater, domestic servant, 45.
- Hlaford, A.-S., source of bread; a master, lord, 44.
- Hlafordsocn, A.-S., jurisdiction of a hlaford, 162.
- Hlafordswic, A.-S., treachery to a lord, 106, 130.
- Hobiller, O. E., a sort of soldier, rider of a hobby; a cognate of cavaller, chevalier, &c., 337.
- Hofdingr, O. N., for haufudingr, a head person, governor, 204, 210.
- Hofdreingr, O. N., a courtier, 249.
- Hofgesind, O. G., a court companion, ib.
- Hofudsmadr, O. N., a headsman, captain, governor, 210.
- Hold, A.-S., a feudal client, 114, 115, 151; an officer of rank, 121.
- Hold and getriwe*, A.-S., faithful and true; a feudal formula, 114.
- Holde othes, O. Eng., oaths of fealty and homage, 152: see hyldath.
- Hollur vinur*, O. N., faithful friend; a feudal appellation. 121.
- Homagium facere*, introduced instead of fidem dare and firmitatem facere, 95.
- Homage, 151, &c.
- Homagium, Low Lat., 152.
- Homin, part of Lat. homin-e; Mr. Wining's derivation, 301.
- Homines et domini*, among the Saxons, 155.
- Hominium, Low Lat., for homagium, 151.
- Homo fidelis devenire*, a feudal formula, equivalent to O. N. gioraz hanns mann, 135, n.
- Honores et cavalleriæ*, in Arragon, 337.
- Hordere, A.-S., a treasurer, 295.
- HORNE TOOKE, his derivations, of ale, 34, n.; of hlaford, 44, n.
- Horseknave, O. E., 292.
- Horsethegn, A.-S., a master of horse, 295.
- Hostler, 293.
- Households, royal and imperial, were only enlargements of the establishments of counts and barons, 65; Anglo-Saxon, 155.
- Housekarls, domestics, 273.
- Houetmann, O. G., head-man, a municipal officer, 210.
- Huldschap, troskap, och manskap*, O. Sw., fealty, troth, and homage; a formula in the oath of fealty, 114, n.
- Huldskab og trotskab*, O. D., fealty and troth; Danish formula, 116.
- Hunda fadhs or fads, Goth., leader or maintainer of the hundred, 41, 42.

Hundredarius, Low Lat., a hundredman, 104.
 Hundreders, 197.
 Hundredes ealdor, A.-S., a centurion, 41, 104, n.
 Hunno, O. G., a centurion, judge of a hundred, 197.
 Husband, 132: see Bonde, fundus.
 Hyde, A.-S., a measure of land, called chursa, a skin of land in Rajasthan, 47.
 Hyldath, A.-S., oath of fealty, 113, 114, 115, n., 151.
 Hylde, Dan., verb, to swear fealty, 116, n.
 Hyldo, A.-S., protection, favour, fealty, 115.
 Hyredmen, A.-S., men of the hyred, or courtiers, 155.

IGNOBILES, German serfs, 170.
 Infantes, Low Lat., young nobles, 327.
 Infideles, Low Lat., explained by fellones, 143.
 -ing, a termination of nouns, not a patronymic, giving its subject a possessive import, 170, 192; addit. notes to p. 214.
 Ingenui, Lat., well born, noblemen, 168, 170.

JAGARA, Sskt., a coat of mail, 73.
 Jagir, Persic, a military fief, ib.
 Jarl, O. N., an earl, ancient creation of, 205; derivation, 217, 218; an illustrious title, 219: see eorl, earl.
 Johnny Faa, Fad, or Faw, Gipseys title, a corruption of senapati, 42; earl of the Gipseys, 221.
 Judex, Lat., a judge; originally one skilled in the art of war, 183; a military officer, 311.
Jus hagestoltziatum, 34.
 Jutama, see Gautama.
 Juvenes, Lat., youths; in Amm. Marcellinus, for knights, 102, n.; are cnihitas and knechten attendant on the ancient German chiefs, 169.

KAISER, Gr., an emperor, from the Slavonic czar, 167.
 Karl, O. N. & G., a working man, 221; the representative of the class of husbandmen, 377.
 Kindins, Goth., a governor; etymologically the Latin centenus and the Burgundian hendinos, a king, 192.
 KING, in early times, a nominal title, 79; low condition of, 186; Sir F. Palgrave on the importance of its etymology, 188; synonymes of, 193; probably from Sanskrit kuni, with termination -ing, 194; the owner of one hundred serfs, a king, 196; king of a burh or canton in Eastland, ib.; multitudes with the title in Norway, 198, 199; conferred on all sorts of petty chiefs, 185, 200; great numbers that fall in battle, 201, n.; changed into jarl, 205; in old English, the title of a female sovereign, 207.

Kingdom, not originally divided into provinces, but an aggregate of them, 66; the term relates to power or people, 186.

King's steward, 252.

Kingsfriend, a title; see amici, 121.

Knab, O. G., a belted soldier, 292, n.

Knecht, knecto, kneht, O. G., a knight or youth, 102, 169, 329, 333.

Knight, 326, &c.; etymon, 333; Daines Barrington on the title, 334; of any degree, companion of his chief, 83.

Knights or Youths, among the ancient Germans, 102; custom of receiving them into the nation, 103, 169.

Knights Bachellor, 338, &c.

Knygtesmetehom, A.-Saxon, translation of militis feodum, 47; extract relating to it from the Shaftesbury papers, 48, n.

Königen, Gr., a female king, 207.

Kona, O. N., woman, wife, lady, 208. See Queen.

Kuni, perhaps the etymon of king, 194. See dhriti, and dryhten, rita, and rector, rihter.

Lady, 208.

Læn, O. N.; =loan Eng. how it came to denote feod, in the sense of land as the wage of military service, 128, 134, 141.

Læti, Low Lat., small commoners, 172.

Laird, Scot., a good man, as land proprietor, 315; a less baron, 317.

Lanardrottinn, O. N., a lord paramount, 129; lord of a læn.

Land, maxim of the feudalists, 57; its origin, 60; common property among the Germanic people, 58; and equally shared on conquest, down to 5th century, 59; vested in an individual in its origin as a possession, a legal fiction, 60; not the patrimony of ancient sovereigns, 64; shared by admeasurement among the Normans, 59; — by lots, 90, n.; substituted for food in requitement of military service, 126.

Land, allodial, 133.

Landgraff, landrichter, O. G., the first, a larger kind of graff; the second, a provincial judge, 277.

Landræcke, O. N., compeller of a country, epithet or title of a general, 180.

Landweard, A.-S., warder of the land, 45, n.

Languages, classical and Teutonic, 7, &c., table of descent from Sanskrit or Babylonian, 19.

Lardener, 261, n.

Larderer, 260.

Lassi, Low Lat., handicraftsmen, 57, 170, 172.

LATIN, inadequate to represent the law terms of the Gothic conquerors of Rome, 94.

Lavardur, Icel., a warder of the land, not the original of hlaford, 45, n.

Law, of Alf, the pirate, 30; poor law of England founded on the same principle, 31; feudal distinction of its periods, 67, n.

Leal et feal amy, 112; lealtad, Sp., ib.

- Led- or Letgreve, 278 : see Court Leet.
 Lehn, G., len, O. N., a fief, 128.
 Lenadr madr, O. N., holder of len, a man enfeoffed, 128.
 Lendir madr, O. N., holder of a len, a baron, 128, 129, n.
 Leod, A.-S., a chief, 230 ; — court, jurisdiction of a leod, 120 ; — cyning, a prince, 231.
 Leod gild, A.-S., compensation to the tribe for homicide, 120, n.
 Leudes, Teut., noble vassals, 20.
 Levedy, O. E., a lady, 208.
 Lhoaverd, O. E., a lord, in the English-Saxon title of Hen. III., addit. notes, 220.
Libertatis, customs of a Saxon court, 156, n.
 Liberti, Lat., freedmen, 168, 179.
 Libertini, Lat., offspring of liberti, 169, 173.
 Liti, Low Lat., the same as læt, 172 and n.
 Limitis dux, Lat., a duke or commander of the borders, 278 ; — comes, 280 : see Lords Marchers, Marquis.
 LOCCENIUS, his dictionary, a collection of feudal terms, derived from Gothic languages, 68.
 Lord, source of bread, 44 ; Tooke's derivation, ib., n. ; Dr. Johnson's, 45, n.
 Lordine, lourdan, O. E., men of the quality of a lord, 171.
 Lord mayor ; see mayor.
 Lords Marchers, 286, &c.
 Lords of towns, 318, n. ; 359.
 Lorverd, O. E., a lord, 318, n.
 Louerdying, O. E., same as lordine, 171, 172.
 Loverd, O. E., a lord, 318, n.
 Loyalté, fealty, how derived from fidelitas, 112.
 Lucoman, Etrusc., lagaman, a law man, a judge, 39, n.
- MADAME, Fr., proper term of addressing a queen, 209.
 Magaczogo, O. G., leader of a kindred band among the Franks ; a duke of kinsmen, 54.
 Magodriht, A.-S., lord of a kindred band, 54, 330, 332.
 Maire de palais, Fr., governor of the palace, 351 ; from Lat. major, or O. G. meyer, q. v. See mayor.
 Maitre de l'office, Fr., an apothecary, 272, n.
 Major, a Low Lat. n. Subst., derived from one of the German dialects. In Arabia, mar is a great lord ; and in Mewar, the commander of the armed vassals ; a mayor of a corporate town, 239.
 Major domus, governor of a household, 251.
 Majorissa, Low Lat., a mayoress, 239.
 Man, a vassal, 110, 154 ; the reasoning animal, 300, 301.
 Mandryhten, A.-S., a lord of vassals, lord of the homagers, 157.
 Manhede, O. E. manhood ; homage, 114.
 Mann-us, the progenitor of the Germans, 301.

- Manræd, A.-S., homage, 48, 56, n.: see manya
- Manred, O. E., homage, 48, n.
- Manschap, D., manskab, O. Dan., maskap, O. Sw., homage, 114, n., 116, n.
- Manya, Sskt., obedience, 114, n.
- Mar, Teut., a horse, appears to be an epithet of a war charger, 290; Arab., a great lord, 239; a war cry of the Rajpoots, addit. notes to p. 281, n.
- March, a frontier, boundary, limit, 279
- Marches, Lords, 286, &c.
- Marchese, It., a marquis, 279.
- Marchio, Low Lat., a lord marcher, marquis, ib.
- Marckgraff, G., marquis, 277, 278.
- Marcomanni, men of the marches, hunters, 282.
- Marescallus, Low Lat., mar, a horse, skalk, an officer. See constable and marshal.
- Mareschall, 293.
- Marga, Sskt., a hunter, 281,
- Margo, Sskt., same as mark, 282.
- Marha, a Scythian standard, 279, 281, and n.
- Marica, Lat., tutelary nymph of the margo, 282.
- Marischalcia, Low Lat., sort of stable, farriery, office of marshal, 293.
- Marpahis, O. G., a horse page or boy, 290.
- Marquis, 278, &c.
- Marsch, O. Sw., commander of cavalry, 294.
- Marshal, origin of the office, 289; of 12 horses, 292; a farrier, 293; Mountfort, hereditary marshal, ib.
- Marstaller, G., a hostler, 294.
- Marz, Persic, a march, mark, or boundary, 279; — bum, id. ib. See murzaban.
- Maryya, Sskt., a mark or boundary, 281.
- Maxim of feudalists, on the proprietary of lands, 57, 60, 64. See land.
- Meare, A.-S., a mark, a country as well as a boundary, ib.
- Mer, a military chief of vassals in Rajasthan, 240.
- Mercy, royal prerogative of, among the Germanic tribes, 105.
- Meregreve, O. Flem., a count, according to the Old Saxon interpretation; perhaps a marckgraff, 278, n.
- Merki, O. N., a standard, 280.
- Merkismann, O. N., standard bearer, or rather a nobleman entitled to raise his own standard, 282.
- Metegavel, A.-S., rent paid in meat, 48.
- Methom, A.-S., meat home, place of meat, ancient translation of feodum, 48. See ham and eating.
- Meyer, O. G., administrator of a town, 239.
- Meykongur, O. N., female king, a queen, 207.
- Miles, Lat., translated cniht, 330; apparently from Sskt. root mil, to congregate, and the oblique cases in milit-, from its participle milita, thus corresponding with Goth. gadrauhteis in signification.

- Militis feodum, Low Lat., a knight's fee, translated a knight's meat-home, or place of food, 48.
- Missus regis, see bailiff, 274, n.
- Monarchy, title of, nominal till the tenth century, 67; growth of its power, 64.
- Morgengab, G., morning gift, a nuptial present from a baron, 320, n.
- Mounds, sepulchral, business of importance transacted on, 206, n.
- Munus et beneficium*, 95, 141.
- Murzaban, Persic, governor of a hostile frontier, 279. See marquis, ban, fan, &c.
- NESEKONGUR, O. N., king of a cape or promontory, 200.
- Nobiles, 168, 170.
- NICHOLSON, Bishop, on the progress of the feudal law, 67, n.
- Normans, their abject oath of allegiance, 117.
- Nulla terra sine domino*, a feudal maxim, origin of, 97.
- OATH, to defend a chief, 107, 110, n.; of fealty among Anglo-Saxons, 114; Franks, 116, n.; Normans, 117.
- Oathsword, 118.
- Obeissance, Fr., homage, 358; see manya.
- Officer, originally an apothecary, 272, n.
- Omes buenos, O. S., goodmen, a class below esquire, 309.
- OSMUNDUS DRENGOTUS, a knight, meaning of his name, 160.
- Othes, hold, O. E., 152: see hyldath.
- PA, Sskt., to drink, said to be the etymon of pincerna, 262, n.
- Padram, Sskt., a village: see patria, 43.
- Page, a boy, its derivation, 280; an inferior soldier, 292.
- Pagettus, Low Lat., a soldier, not an archer, ib. n.
- Paiti, a belly full, a ration, military pay of the Rajpoots, 36, 38, 39, 49. See bhat, batta.
- Palace, a fortification of wooden pales or stakes; a stockade, 244.
- Palatii præfectus, Lat., mayor of the palace, 251.
- Palatine or palace counts, 242, &c.
- PALGRAVE, Sir FRANCIS, derives feudum from emphyteusis, 50; traces feodality to the Roman law, 60, 80; on the etymology of the title of king, 188; on the title of earl, 220.
- Pallus, Lat., the pfal and phal of the old Germans; a stake, 245, 246.
- Paltsgrave, G., a count palatine, 248, 249, n.
- Pana, Sskt., wages, from pa, to drink, 53: see drinclean.
- Par, Lat., an equal, the equivalent of fera in gefera, 228, n.
- Pater, Lat., the equivalent of father, 40; their cognates, 41; title of a magistrate, 43, 44.
- Paternus, the equivalent of Gothic fadreins, 43.
- Pati, Sskt., master, husband, lord, the same as fads, fawd, 41.

- Patres, plural of pater; derivation by Sallust, 32, n.; by Florus, 40; their early duties, 51.
- Patricius, Lat., a title of alderman, 215.
- Patronus, Lat., a wealthy proprietor; Sanskrit patrah, 44.
- Pay, a ration; see paiti.
- Pecunia, Lat., money, from Sanskrit paçu, cattle, through pecus, id., the equivalents of Goth. faihus, A.-S. feoh, Engl. fee and fief, 296; vira, for cattle, ib. n.
- Pedar, Persic, a father, 40.
- Peer, an equal, 228.
- Pegni, in Cnute's Forest Law for thegni, 178.
- Penon, the banner of a knight, 285, 365.
- People, their great power in the ancient Germanic states, 137, 138.
- Perquisitor, see conquæstor.
- Pfal, G., a stake, 245.
- Pfaltz, G., a palace, 246.
- Pfaltzgraff, a count of the palace, 249.
- Phala, O. G., a wooden tower, 245.
- Pile, a castle, 247, n.
- Pincerna, Lat., an officer in an Anglo-Saxon household, 156, n.; duty and derivation, 261, and n.; Pott's derivation, 262.
- PINKERTON, on universality of feudal system, 69.
- Pirates, their vessels, 202, n.
- Pitri, Sskt., a father; Brahmanical derivation, 41.
- Pitris, Sskt., ancestors, certain divine beings, 52, n. See patres.
- Pitt and gallows*, custom of, among the ancient Norwegians, 104; among the English, 105.
- Pledge, view of frank, 120.
- Plunder, the means of a chief's magnificence, 54.
- Pocillator, Lat., a leathern bag or bottle keeper, 265, 267, n.
- Polk, a Cossack regiment; = folk, fylk, 199.
- Portator scutellæ, a dish bearer, 272.
- Præfectus prætorii, 248; — viarum, 260.
- Prebenda avenæ, 294.
- Prencepe de las Asturias*, title of the heir apparent of Spain, 214.
- Prerogative of mercy, royal, 105.
- Preuds homes, O. Fr., magnificent men, 316.
- Prince, a fore-man, 211; election of, 212; low rank in Russia, 213.
- Princeps coquorum, 270, n.; — senatus, a chief of the senate, 211.
- Principes, chosen to be patres of Rome, 39; the aldoras of the Saxons; a title of aldermen, 215.
- PROBUS, his feudal law, 87.
- Prodes homines, Low Lat., barons, 316.
- Proud, magnificent, 316; etymology of, 317.
- Proudhome, O. Fr., a nobleman, 316.
- Puer Anglicus*, heir apparent of England, 327.

Purgos, Gr., not the etymon, but the cognate of, burgh, 254.

Putta, a military fief in Mewar, 72, n.; — wut, the holder of a putta, a feudal lord, 127.

QUADI, Lat., a nation of hunters, 282.

Quean, had not a bad sense, without an addition, 207, n.

Queen, a woman, wife, a royal consort, 207.

RADECHENISTRES, Domesd., a sort of horseman, 331.

Radknights, ib.

Rædhere, A.-S., a riding army, cavalry, 332.

Ragineis, Goth., a counsellor, supposed to be connected with Lat. rex, Eng. rich, Sp. rico, &c., 179.

Raja, Sskt., a king; Brahmanical derivation, 179.

Rajpoots, their feudal system immemorial, 38.

Rakshi, Sskt., a king, preserver, nourisher; the etymon of rex, 150.

Rawul, Asiatic title of governor, addit. notes to p. 215.

Reccere, A.-S., a governor, 180.

Rector, Lat., a governor, 184, &c.

Rege, Lat., from raja, 179.

Regolo, a Chinese title of governor, addit. notes to p. 215.

Regulus, Low Lat., title of aldorman, 215. See rawul, regulo.

Reiks, Goth., a prince, 178.

Reiter, G., a rider, a knight, 336.

Rekr, O. N., a hero, epithet of a prince, 180.

Relevium, Low Lat., used for the A.-Saxon heregeat, by William I., 149.

Relief, of the Anglo-Saxons, 147; introduced by the Sakasenas, ib. n.

Reve, in sheriff, &c., 229.

Reviewer, Foreign Quarterly, on early population of Europe, 77.

Rex, Lat., a king; derived by Postal from the Hebrew rosch, 173; corresponds with raja and rakshi, 179.

Rice, A.-S., powerful, rich, 307.

Rich, riche, rico, &c., its import, 62, &c.; connected with Sskt. rikthum, wealth, 180.

RICHARDSON, on Asiatic fiefs, 70.

Richman, a powerful man, 308, &c.

Rici hombres, ricos hombres, ricos homes, ricos omes, O. Sp., rich or powerful men, nobles, 179, 309.

Ricus homo, Low Lat., a powerful man, a noble, ib.

Riddare, O. N., on that rides, a knight, 157, n., 336; — notta, knights-companions, 157, n.

Ridder, Dan., same, ib.

Ridherlikæ, O. Sw., esquires, 157, n.

Rihter, G., a righter, rector; a judge, 184, 185, n.

Rikr, O. N., powerful, 307.

Rikr madr, O. N., a powerful man; title or epithet of a sovereign, 308.

- Rita, Sskt., a descendant of Kuni, 194, n. See rihter, rector.
- Ritter, G., a knight, 336.
- Robbery, anciently honourable, 145; promise of feudal lords to abstain from it, 319, n.
- ROLLO, Duke, partitions Neustria by admeasurement, 59.
- Romakas, men with hairy clothes, 20: see Romans, early.
- Romans, early, and their patria, 44; may have been the Romakas, ib.; forget their feudal system in the time of Cimbric wars, 63, 78; begin to imitate German customs, 80; examples, 85, &c.; pay their comites in food like the Germans, 85; their gentile appellation a term of reproach among the barbarian conquerors, 92; this distinction adopted by Charlemagne, 96, n.; not the authors of the feudalism that existed among the Northern nations, and their descendants, in the middle ages, 76—99.
- Rykis, O. Pruss., a prince, 179.
- SÆCYNING, A.-S., a sea king, captain of one or more ships, 200.
- Sacæ, see Sakas, Sakasen.
- Sagas, even the fabulous, valuable as records of customs and manners, 101.
- ST. MARTIN, on the origin of feudalism, 62.
- Sakas and Sakasen, Asiatic tribes, progenitors of the Saxons, 21.
- Salic land, possession of, a title to nobility, 234.
- SANSKRIT, its antiquity, 9, &c.; oldest sister of the European languages, 16; ceased to be spoken 3000 years ago, 18; writings some centuries older than the Christian era, ib. n.; supposed to be Babylonian, 19.
- Savila, a divine cow, answering to the Scandinavian cow sibylla, 21.
- Scabinus, law of duel for one, 159, n.
- Scandinavia, governed on feudal principles, 68; its feudal usages, 100—139.
- Scantio, Low Lat., a proper name, 266.
- SCANTIO, Low Lat., a skinker, in the household of Charlemagne, 269; in the Salic law, 270.
- Schilpor, O. G., a shield bearer, 346.
- Schildknaphen, O. G., youths, shieldbearers, 346.
- Scoll, Scot., a health in drinking, 275; Teut., a drinking cup, 276.
- Scullion, ib.
- Scutage, an incident in Anglo-Saxon and Asiatic feods, 153.
- Scutellifer, Low Lat., a dish bearer, 271.
- Scutiger, Low Lat., a shield bearer, 346.
- Scyldburh, A.-S., fortress of shields; a prince's body guard, 84, n.
- Scyregerefa, A.-S., the bailiff, judge, and military chief of a shire; a sheriff, 229, 277.
- Seigneur, Fr., a lord, with the right of raising a signum or standard, 287.
- SELDEN, his Titles of Honor, 12, 13; on the amici and comites, of Tiberius, 83; on the origin of the feudal system, 86.
- Sen, O. G., a concourse of people, 43.
- Sena, Sskt., an army, 42.
- Senapati, Sskt., a general, lord of the sena, its provider and maintainer, 42.

- Senatores, chiefs of the Roman tribes, 42 ; derivation by Florus, 40 : see patres.
- Senatus, the meeting of the senatores ; its etymological correspondence with synodos, 43.
- Sendimenn, O. N., royal messengers, missi regii, 274, n.
- Senescalcia Angliæ, 270.
- Senescallus, Low Lat., for senescalcus, cup-servant, or bearer of a scæne or skänk, 269, &c. ; in the Alammanic law, 292.
- Seneschall, 269, &c. ; from preceding.
- Senha, O. Sp., a standard ; from Lat. signum, 288.
- Senheria, O. Sp., the same, ib.
- Senhor, O. Sp., a lord having the privilege of raising his senha ; a baron, 287.
- Senhoria, O. Sp., a lordship, ib.
- Senior, Low Lat., from signum, the same as senhor, ib.
- Seniscalcus, see senescallus, 269.
- Senne, O. Fr., a synod, 43 : see sen.
- Sennorio, It., a lordship : see senhoria.
- Serjeant, from serviens, a servant, 345, 346, 347.
- Serjeanty, grand and petit, 164.
- Service, considered disgraceful, 55.
- Seyngnour de la tere, O. F., a landlord, 325, n.
- Sheriff, the bailiff of a shire, 229.
- Shieldbearer, 346, &c.
- Shiregreve, shirereve, O. E., sheriff, 277.
- SHUTTLEWORTH, a proper name, warder of the dishes, 272, n.
- Sibylia, a divine cow among the ancient Swedes, the Savila of the Hindûs, 21.
- Sider, an abettor, 237.
- Sidesman, 236, &c.
- Sidhesmen, A.-S., assessors of the gesidh in his court, afterwards termed judices curiæ, 231, 236.
- Sidhessocna, A.-S., the manor court, 231, 237.
- Sieur, Fr., a hero, Sanskrit sura, a valiant man, 323.
- Signum, Lat., in middle ages, a bell, or the ringing of it, 43 ; derivation, 288.
- Sinistus, O. Burgund., a high priest, 190 ; derivation, ib. n.
- Siokongur, O. N., a sea king, 200 ; the small force necessary to constitute one, 201 ; vessels of the sea kings, 202, n.
- Sire, Fr., same as sieur, 322, &c.
- Sires de la terre*, Fr., landlords, 324.
- Siresse, O. Fr., fem. of sire, 323.
- Sithi, Sskt., a disciple, 80 : see sidhesman, gasindhai, gesidh, &c.
- Skænsksvein, O. Sw., a cup-boy, a skinker, 270 ; where skænksven by misprint.
- Skal, Icel., a drinking cup, 274.
- Skalk, O. N., a military servant, 345 ; derivation, 347, n.

- Skialldborg, O. N., fortress of shields, a prince's body guards, 84, n.
 Skienkare, Icel., a skinker, 265.
 Skinker, a cup-bearer, 261, &c.; derivation 265; the escantio in the household of Henry II., 266.
Skulls, to drink a round of, 275, 276; cups so called 268. See scoll.
 Skutilsvein, 271.
 Soc, A.-S., a privilege to try causes, 162.
 Socage, incident of Anglo-Saxon feudal service, ib.
 Socage tenure, not plough service, 232; Blackstone's opinion, 233.
 Soche, Low Lat., for soc, 162, n.
 Society, orders of, 168; origin of ranks; see Rigs Mal, 375.
Socmanria libera, chief incidents of, 61.
 Socmen, 162, &c.; were equals, 235.
 Socn, A.-S., radically social intercourse; a jurisdiction, 234; probably what Tacitus calls pagus, 235.
 Sortes Barbarorum, division of land by lot, among the Barbarian conquerors, 90.
 Sovereigns, petty, their household, 65; titles, 67.
 Sovereigns, titles of, 175, &c.
 Spahis, Turkish feudatories, 72.
 SPELMAN, his derivation of feodum, 49.
 Spence, O. E., a larder, 260.
 Spencer, officer in a household, 260, &c.
 Stagia, Low Lat., a dwelling house, probably so called from staigai, the ascent to it, 259.
 Steward, 251, &c.
 Stai, Icel. opus, suggested to be the etymon of steward, 253, 258.
 Stie, O. E., stye, Sw., an ascending path, 256; a concealed passage, ib.
 Stig, A.-S. & O. E., the same as stie, 257.
 Stiward, A.-S., steward, 252.
 Strator, in Salic law, a litter maker for horses, 292; substituted for marshal, 293.
 Stretewarde, O. E., a street patrol, 260.
 Steward, O. E., a stiward, 252.
 Sty, O. E., an ascending passage to a manor house, 258, &c.
 Subregulus, Low Lat.; see Addit. Notes to p. 215.
 Sucken, in Zetland, socn or jurisdiction of a fawd, 137, 234.
 SULLIVAN, on origin of benefices, 66; and on beneficiary estates, 96.
 Svardægi, O. N., an oath, opposed to the trunadreidr or oath of fealty, a daily or ordinary oath, 112.
 Sydesman, O. E., assistant to a baron, 238.
 Synodos, 43.
- TALK, GREAT, among the red men; a senate and a parliament, 40.
 Tapster, 270: see dapifer.
Tenere in alodio, 97.

- Tenure, Norman, 163.
- Thacoor, see grasya thacoor.
- Thegn, A.-S., a Saxon nobleman, equal to a Norman baron, 129.
- Theodecynning, A.-S., an independent king, 183.
- Theoden, A.-S., epithet of an aldor, 182.
- THEODORIC, the Goth, probably chose thiudans for his title, 180.
- Theow, A.-S., a slave, 172.
- Thesaurus, Lat., a treasure; derivation, 296.
- Thief, supposed that none but a theow would become one, 55; derivation, ib. n.
- Thiodann, O. N., lord, prince, 181.
- Thiuda, Goth., a people, ib.
- Thiudans, G., title of Theodoric, ib.
- Thiufad, Visigo., a judge, leader of the people, 41, n.
- Thuman, O. E., theow, a slave, and man, a slave, 167, 172.
- Thungiat, in the army of Childebert, 65: see tunginus.
- Tignarkonur, O. N., ladies of title, 170.
- Tignarmenn, O. N., men of title, 173.
- Timars, Turkish fiefs, 72.
- Tinel du roy, Fr., the king's bell, 126: see bellhouse.
- Titles, reasonable mode of deriving, 10, 23; origin and universal adoption, of, 173, &c.
- TOD, Col., on feudalism in Mewar, 68, 71.
- Town, in English law, 359, n.
- Traditions, Asiatic, apparently relating to settlers in Europe, 20.
- Treachery, to a lord, 106; included in the term felony, ib. n.; and desertion, 130, n.
- Treasurer, 295.
- Treow sculan*, Anglo-Saxon feudal formula, to owe troth or truage, 122.
- Trithingreve, 278.
- Trosteid, O. G., oath of a trustis, 151.
- Troth, O. E., for fealty, 121: see truth.
- Trowage, O. E., feudal troth, 122.
- Truage, O. E., same, ib.
- Trueman, O. E., a loyal subject, 123.
- Trunadar eidr, O. N., oath of troth and fealty, 151.
- Trustes, Low Lat., trueman, 121.
- Truth, from Sanskrit dhru, to be firm, fixed, established, 122.
- Tunginus, Low Lat., chief officer of a town, 65, n.
- Tungreve, the reeve of a town or manor, 239, 278.
- UDELL SUCCESSION, 136.
- VAHNLEHN, O. G., banner feod, feodum vexillare, 284, 285.
- Vair, Goth., a strong man, its relation to baron, &c., 305.
- Valets de chandelle, Fr., candle or torch holders at great tables, 222.

- Valvasini, Low Lat., dependents on the valvasors, 369, n.
- Valvasor, Low Lat., Spelman's derivation, 298; from Sanskrit varivas, service, 299; further account of, 355, &c.
- VANS KENNEDY, Col., on early population of Europe, 15; descent of languages, 18, 19.
- Varones, Sp., men, equivalent to barones, 305.
- Vasallus, Low Lat., a vassal, supposed to be O. N. veisluman, 46, and vaisla, 134, n.
- Vassi, Low Lat., supposed to denote servants, 55, n.; are household officers, from Sanskrit vas, to dwell, 360, n.
- Vasvasor, Low Lat., for valvasor, 298.
- Vavasor, vavasur, 359: see valvasor.
- Veisla, O. N., a banquet, a feod, 46; hence
- Veislumann, a vassal, ib.
- Vicecount, 224.
- Vicedominus, 356.
- Vidame, a bishop's deputy, ib.
- Vir, Lat., a strong man, a hero, 304; its cognates, 305.
- Vira, Sskt., strength, 302.
- Vira and virah, Sskt., the same as vir.
- Viscount, 225, n.
- Vogt, G., a governor; see faad, fawd.
- Vruue, O. Dan., a lady, queen, 209.
- WACHTER, his mistake on the meaning of allodium, and derivation from anhlot, 90.
- Wædsla, O. Swed., a feast, 52; rent, tribute, &c., 134, n. See veisla.
- Wages, paid in early times in food and lodging, 52.
- Waidsluman, O. Swed., a vassal, 134, n.
- Walreaf, A.-S., plunder of the dead; reason of the law of, 206, n.
- Wapentake, wapnatak, weapon touching, a custom on swearing fealty and homage, 118; is taken for the name of a hundred, ib.; relic of the custom among the Romans, 119.
- War, law of private, 154; — shield, custom of striking, 124.
- Wardship, practised by all the Germanic nations, and an incident in Anglo-Saxon feudalism, 152.
- Wer, A.-S., = vir, Lat., derived by Dr. Webster from geber, 11, n.; its cognates, 305.
- Wergild, A.-S., compensation for homicide, and a test of rank, 102, n.
- Wiegerefa, A.-S., of Winchester, 278.
- WILLIAM I., imported a few Norman customs, 143.
- Wita, A.-S., one skilled in witodh or law, 33, n.
- Witheit, the judicial council of Bremen, ib.
- Words, primitive, not borrowed from other languages, 14.
- WRIGHT, Sir Matthew, approves of a ridiculous derivation of feodum, 49.

YEOMAN, 167.

Youths, were knights, 169; honors paid to them by rude nations, 327.

Yule, absurd derivation, 45, n.

ZANA, Low Lat., a tumultuary assembly; corresponds with sen and sena, 43.

Zepterlehn, O. G., a scepter feod, 284.

REMOVED FROM BIRCHIN-LANE.

Henry Kent Causton, respectfully announces that the site of his late premises in Birchin Lane having been required for the erection of a new Building, the Warehouse for his Publications is removed to the Printing Offices, situate as below, (formerly the Million Bank) where having spacious Premises, with every facility for Business on an extensive scale, he shall be happy to undertake the Publication of Works of any magnitude.

Embellishments and Illustrations on Steel, Copper, Wood, or Stone, and Printing in Letter=Press, Copper=Plate or Lithography, executed in the best manner, and on terms as eligible as any other establishment in the trade.

Manuscripts arranged for the press, Translations, &c.

Printing Offices,

3, Nag's Head Court, Gracechurch Street,
London.

Published by Henry Kent Causton, London.

In Two Volumes, Octavo, with illuminated Fac-simile Engravings of Anglo-Saxon Kalendars.

MEDII ÆVI KALENDARIUM

Or Dates, Charters, and Customs of the Middle Ages, with Kalendars from the Tenth to the Fifteenth Century; and an Alphabetical digest of Obsolete Names of Days, forming a Glossary of the Dates and Ecclesiastical Observances of the Middle Ages.

By R. T. HAMPSON.

This Work, which extends to about a thousand pages, is Embellished with a Facsimile of the Kalendar prefixed to King Athelstan's Psalter (Cott. MS. Galba, A. xviii); and also with a Facsimile of the Anglo-Saxon Kalendar (Cott. MS. Vitellius E. xviii.), as mutilated by the fire at Westminster in 1731.

* * * Price (the few remaining Copies), 32s., in Cloth.

CRITICAL NOTICES OF THE WORK.

Mr. Hampson makes no parade of his researches, but has diligently consulted manuscript authorities, and brought forward much new and very curious matter, hitherto neglected or unemployed.—QUARTERLY REVIEW.

To say nothing for the moment of the mass of learning comprised in these two volumes, the indefatigable energy of research they evidence, and the extraordinary extent of reading, with the never-ceasing labour of collation and correction which they display, suffice to establish the author in the highest rank in antiquarian literature.—MANCHESTER GUARD.

All the explanations are supported by references to authorities; and the illustrations, which are particularly necessary in a work of this nature, are mostly derived from MSS. in the British Museum, and other public libraries. As a work of reference it is calculated to be an invaluable, and ought to be an indispensable appendage to every clerical, legal, and historical library.—MORNING HERALD.

THE PAPAL BULL OF LEO X.

CONFERRING ON

KING HENRY VIII. OF ENGLAND,

THE TITLE OF

Defender of the Faith.

Fac-simile of the Original, mutilated by the Fire at Westminster in 1731.

With a perfect Copy from an early Transcript; an explanation of the Autographs, &c.

Price, Large Paper 7s. 6d.—Small Paper 5s.

In 8vo. price 5s., with Engravings, Autographs, &c.

THE PAPAL JEWEL IN THE PROTESTANT CROWN.

An Historical Note, illustrative of the preceding

Published by Henry Kent Causton, London.

NEW LAW OF INHERITANCE.

With Illustrative Plates, Tables of Descent, &c.—Price 7s. 6d. bound in Cloth.

THE RIGHTS OF HEIRSHIP;

Or the Doctrine of Descents and Consanguinity, as applied by the Laws of England to the Succession of Real Property and Hereditaments; and as affected by the new statutes of Inheritance and Limitation; including the descent of Titular Honors and Coat Armour; and the respective rights of participation in the personal estate of an intestate, under the statute of Distribution, &c. &c.

In Fcap 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. in Cloth. (free by Post, 3s. 4d.)

HOW TO MAKE A WILL;

A Familiar Exposition of the NEW LAW OF WILLS, with Notes; an Historical Review; a Summary of all the Clauses, to facilitate the Making a Will; and an extensive Index.

Price 2s. 6d.—Free by Post 3s. 6d.

HOW TO PROVE A WILL,

And to Administer the Effects and Estate: being a familiar Guide to the Duties of an Executor, and an Administrator.

FORMS OF WILLS, &c.

UNDER THE NEW ACT.

Price 6d. each, or the Set of Six, 3s. (Free by Post 3s. 6d.)

No. I.

Form of a Will, where the Property of Testator is left to one or more Persons absolutely.

No. II.

Form of a Will, where the Property of Testator is left to Wife for life, and after her death to Children absolutely.

No. III.

Form of a Will, where the Property of Testator is left to Executors in trust, to be sold, and proceeds paid to any number of Devisees.

No. IV.

Form of a Will, where the Property of Testator is left to Executors in trust, to pay proceeds to Testators Children, with provision for maintenance during minority, &c.

No. V.

Form of a Will, where the Property of Testator is left to Wife absolutely.

No. VI.

Instructions for making a Will and Codicil; being a condensed and clear epitome of the clauses of the New Wills Act, which contain the particular observances necessary to the legal execution of a Will, and the Codicil to a Will.

New Edition.—Price 1s. 6d.

GURNEY'S SHORT HAND,

PLAIN INSTRUCTIONS for acquiring this best of all Systems of Stenography: with examples of Reporting in English, French and Latin. By ROBERT SHORTER, Law Reporter.

“A little Work of real utility, suited not only for the use of Public Schools and Private Families, but by the study of which every one, whether connected with Commerce, Law, Divinity or Physic, may be greatly benefited.” It has been adopted as a class-book in several Literary Institutions.

Published by Henry Kent Causton.

GENEALOGY.

In Two large Octavo Volumes (pp. 1122), illustrated with Plans, Tables of Descent, &c. &c.

THE LEIGH PEERAGE:

Being a Full and Complete History of the Claim to the Dormant Title of Baron Leigh, of Stoneley, in the County of Warwick: comprising a full and correct Report of the Evidence adduced before the Lords' Committees for Privileges, taken in Short-Hand by J. GURNEY, Esq., Reporter to their Lordships' House. With Notes, Analytical and Explanatory; and certain additional Evidence, forming the Ultimatum to this very mysterious Case.

"Qui statuit aliquid, parte inaudita altera, Equum licet statuerit, haud æquus est."—Seneca.

"Let boors and franklins say it—I'll swear it.
If it be ne'er so false, a true gentleman may swear it,
In the behalf of his friend."—SHAK.

* * This Work having been several years in part out of print, so that no complete copy could be had, the Publisher has been induced to reprint such parts, and the few remaining copies may now be had at TWENTY SHILLINGS per copy (complete), bound in Cloth. Gentlemen desirous of possessing the record of this extraordinary Genealogical Enquiry, are requested to forward their order either direct to the Publisher, or to any Country Bookseller, as may suit their convenience.

N.B.—As the Baronial Title of Leigh of Stoneley has been recently revived, by a new creation in a distant collateral branch of the Family (who, without any allegation of title in themselves, were the admitted opposers of the late claim), it is proposed by the Editor to form a supplemental Volume, of matter relative to the Ancestral Pretensions of others, from proofs which came into his possession during that investigation,—and the probable ultimate revival of the earlier Creation, from incidents that have recently transpired.

In Octavo.

THE MYSTERIOUS HEIR;

An Analysis of the noble Family of Howard, with its connexions; showing the legal course of descent of those numerous titles, which are generally, but presumed erroneously, attributed to be vested in the dukedom of Norfolk.

In 4to and 8vo (a few Copies only) with Plates, Tables of Descent, &c.

HISTORY OF THE ANTIENT FAMILY OF MARMYUN,

Hereditary CHAMPIONS of the MONARCHS OF ENGLAND. Collected at a great expense from the Public Records.

THE APPEAL OF CHARLES EDWARD DUKE OF MELFORT,

Heir Male and Representative of the House of DRUMMOND OF PERTH. Submitted to the consideration of the Two Houses of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain; with a Table of Descent.

* * The Appellant, an ecclesiastic, at that time in the service of his late Majesty Louis XVIII., prosecuted his claim no further than by laying them before the British Parliament; but the statement of his wrongs receives a lively interest now that his nephew has revived the claim of his family with probable success.

Price 2s. 6d. in Cloth, gilt edges.—One Shilling sewed.

THE ACCOMPLISHED CHESS-PLAYER,

Explaining the Principles of the Game in the most clear and familiar manner; and by way of Introduction, the MORALS OF CHESS, by DR. FRANKLIN.

In this little Treatise, the difficulties of this interesting and hitherto-reputed complex Game are entirely subdued; the Moves of the Pieces are for the first time explained by Diagrams, and the Games introduced for practise are illustrated by Notes, pointing out the views of each player, and the consequences of the several modes of play.

The introduction of Dr. FRANKLIN's celebrated 'Morals of Chess,' renders it particularly appropriate to its object, as an elementary Work for Youth.

1852

THE ROOM OF THE WILD CHESS-PLAYER

1852

Hampson, R. T.

Origines Patriciae; or, deduction of European Titles of Nobility and dignified Offices, from their primitive sources

London 1846

Herald. 63 c

urn:nbn:de:bvb:12-bsb10455146-6